ferent minds among us, I set forth my Declaration of the 26th of December, in which you may see, I am willing to set bounds to the hopes of some, and to the fears of others; of which, when you shall have examined well the grounds, I doubt not but I shall have your concurrence therein. The truth is, I am, in my nature, an enemy to all severity for Religion and Conscience, how mistaken soever it be, when it extends to capital and sanguinary punishments, which I am told were begun in Popish times: Therefore when I say this, I hope I shall not need to warn any here, not to infer from thence, I mean to favour Popery. I must confess to you, there are many of that profession, who have served my Father and my self very well, may fairly hope for some part of that indulgence I would willingly afford to others who dissent from us: But let me explain my self, lest some mistake me herein, as I hear they did in my Declaration: I am far from meaning by this, a toleration or qualifying them thereby to hold any offices or places in the Government; nay, further, I desire some Laws may be made to hinder the growth and progress of their doctrines. I hope you have all so good an opinion of my zeal for the Protestant Religion, as I need not tell you, I will not yield to any therein, not to the Bishops themselves, nor in my liking the Uniformity of it, as it is now established; which being the Standard of our Religion, must be kept pure and uncorrupted, free from all other mixtures: And yet, if the Dissenters will demean themselves peaceably and modestly under the Government, I could heartily wish, I had such a power of indulgence, to use upon occasions, as might not needlessly force them out of the Kingdom, or staying here, give them cause to conspire against the peace of it.

"My Lords and Gentlemen, It would look like flattery in me to tell you, to what degree I am confident of your wisdom and affection in all things, that relate to the greatness and prosperity of the Kingdom. If you consider well what is best for us all, I dare say we shall not disagree."

This Speech, with the Declaration of the 26th of December, alarmed the House of Commons. It may almost be affirmed, that whatever the Commons had done in favour of the King, was only to procure his assent to the Act of Uniformity, and yet, they saw him not only dispense with this Act, but even desire a power to dispense with it, that is, to set it aside as often as he pleased: That this was not only in favour of the Presbyterians, who had a better claim to indulgence than the other Sects, but moreover, in favour of all the Nonconformists. Nay, it was easy to perceive, from what he said concerning the Catholics, that his intention was to prevent their being distinguished from the Protestant Sects, in case his desires were complied with. This justice ought to be done to the High Church party, that though their enemies frequently brand them for Papists, on account of their extreme attachment to certain forms and ceremonies, yet are they as far removed from the essence of Popery, as the other Episcopals, and even the Presbyterians themselves: This they have demonstrated on several very remarkable occasions. The House of Commons, which, as I said, was chiefly composed of High-Churchmen, found in the King's demand, two articles equally opposite to their principles, namely, indulgence for the Presbyterians, and indulgence for the Catholics. Wherefore, they resolved to present an address to the King, wherein, after the necessary compliments, they proceeded in the following manner.

"It is with extream unwillingness and reluctance of heart, that we are brought to differ from your Majesty, which we have thought fit to propose: And tho' we do no way doubt, but that the unreasonable distempers of some men's spirits, and the many mutinies and conspiracies which were carried on during the late intervals of Parliament, did reasonably incline your Majesty to endeavour by your Declaration, to give some allay to those ill humours, till the Parliament assembled; and the hopes of Indulgence, if the Parliament should consent to it; especially seeing the pretenders to this indulgence, did seem to make some titles to it, by virtue of your Majesty's Declaration from Breda. Nevertheless, we your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal Subjects, who are now returned to serve in Parliament from those several parts and places of your Kingdom, for which we were chosen, do humbly offer to your

This probably engaged the Earl of Bristol, a professed Papist, to endeavour utterly to ruin the Chancellor, by impeaching him before the Lords of High-treason, believing doubtless, the King would not be displeased to see him fall by this means, without his having any hand in it. But if it was easy to accuse the Chancellor, it was difficult to draw an impeachment so plausible and coherent as to make him appear criminal. The articles exhibited against him by the Earl of Bristol, were to this effect:

Articles of Accusation against him.

"1. That he had endeavoured to alienate the hearts of his Majesty's Subjects, by artificially insinuating to his creatures and dependants, That his Majesty was inclined to Popery, and designed to alter the established Religion.
"2. He had said to several persons of his Majesty's Privy Council, That his Majesty was dangerously corrupted in his Religion, and inclined to Popery: That persons of that Religion had such access, and such credit with him, that unless there were a careful eye had unto it, the Protestant Religion would be overthrown in this Kingdom.

"3. Upon his Majesty's admitting Sir Henry Bennet to be Secretary of State, in the place of Sir Edward Nicoblas, he said, That his Majesty had given ten thousand pounds to remove a zealous Protestant, that he might bring into that place of high trust a concealed Papist.

"4. In pursuance of the same traitorous design, several friends and dependants of his have said aloud, That were it not for my Lord Chancellor's standing in the gap, Popery would be introduced into this Kingdom.

"5. That he had perswaded the King contrary to his reason, to allow his name to be used to the Pope and several Cardinals in the sollicitation of a Cardinal's cap for the Lord Aubigny, great Almoner to the Queen: In order to effect which, he had employed Mr. Richard Bealing, a known Papist; and had likewise applied himself to several Popish Priests and Jesuits for the same purpose, promising great favour to the Priests here, in case it should be effected.

"6. That he had likewise promised to several Papists, he would do his endeavour, and said, He hoped to compass the taking away all penal Laws against them; to the end they might presume and grow vain upon his Patronage, and by their publishing their hopes of a toleration, encrease the scandal endeavoured by him to be raised throughout the Kingdom.

"7. That being intrusted with the treaty betwixt his Majesty, and his royal Consort the Queen, he concluded it upon articles scandalous, and dangerous to the Protestant Religion: Moreover he brought the King and Queen together, without any settled agreement about the performance of the Marriage-rites: whereby the Queen refusing to be married by a Protestant Priest, in case of her being with child, either the succession should be made uncertain for want of due rites of matrimony, or else his Majesty be exposed to a suspicion of his being married in his own dominions by a Romish Priest.

"8. That having endeavoured to alienate the affections of the King's Subjects upon the score of Religion, he made use of all malicious scandals and jealousies to raise to himself a popular applause of being the zealous Upholder of the Protestant Religion.

"9. That he further endeavoured to alienate the affections of the King's Subjects, by venting in his own discourse, and those of his emissaries, opprobrious scandals against his Majesty's person, and course of life, such as are not fit to be mentioned, unless necessity should require it.

"10. That he endeavoured to alienate the affection of the Duke of York, from his Majesty, by suggesting to him, That his Majesty intended to legitimate the Duke of Monmouth.

"11. That he had perswaded the King, against the advice of the Lord-General, to withdraw the English garrisons out of Scotland, and demolish all the forts built there, at so vast a charge to this Kingdom; and all without expecting the advice of the Parliament of England.

"12. That he endeavoured to alienate his Majesty's affections and esteem for his present Parliament, by telling him, That there was never so weak and inconsistent a House of Lords, nor never so weak and heady a House of Commons: and particularly, That it was better to sell Dunkirk, than to be at their mercy for want of money.

"13. That, contrary to a known law made last sessions, by which money was given and applied for the maintaining of Dunkirk, he advised and effected the sale of the same to the French King.

"14. That he had, contrary to law, enriched himself and his creatures by the sale of offices.

"15. That he had converted to his own use vast sums of publick money raised in Ireland by way of subsidy, private and publick Benevolences, and otherwise given, and intended to defray the charge of the Government in that Kingdom.

"16. That having arrogated to himself a supreme direction of all his Majesty's affairs, he had prevailed to have his Majesty's customs farmed at a lower rate than others offered, and that by persons, with some of whom he went a share, and other parts of money refusing from his Majesty's revenues."

Without entering into the particulars of this charge, I shall content my self with observing, it was unanimously rejected, as improbable, and even contradictory (1). For, besides that the Earl of Clarendon was known to be no less prejudiced against the Papists than against the Presbyterians, it could not but appear strange, that an open and declared Papist, as the Earl of Bristol was, should accuse the Chancellor of favouring the Romish Religion, and, on the other hand of insinuating, that the King was a Papist, in order to alienate the affection of his Subjects. But what was still more extraordinary in this impeachment, is, that the insinuations the Chancellor was accused of, concerning the King, were true in themselves, and that the Earl of Bristol pretended to represent them as slanders.

In this session, the Parliament granted the Duke of York the revenues of the Post-Office (2) and Wine-Licenses. These revenues, which afterwards considerably increased, enabled the Duke of York to keep a separate Court, and live independent of his Brother.

The 27th of July the King gave his assent to the Subsidy-Act and some others, after which he prorogued the Parliament to the 16th of March the following year 1663-4.

Shortly after, the King and Queen made a progress into the West, where they were received with great pomp and magnificence, particularly at Oxford. This was only a journey of pleasure, and after five or six weeks spent in it, they returned to London in October.

While the King was upon his progress, a Conspiracy was discovered, carried on by the old Republicans, and Independents, to restore the Common-wealth. It is pretended, they were to seize several towns, particularly in the North, where they believed themselves strongest, and then raise a general insurrection. But being discovered by one of the complices, many were apprehended, and one and twenty convicted, and executed the January following. It was assured, that Ludlow and Lambert were to head these rebels, though the first never stirred out of Switzerland, where he had fled for refuge. As for Lambert, besides that he never left the Isle of Guernsey where he was confined, if any proofs had appeared against him, he would doubtless, not have been spared. It is true, Ludlow in his Memoirs, seems to own, there was, this year, some project set on foot by the Republicans in England.

This year died Dr. Juxon Archbishop of Canterbury, and was succeeded by Gilbert Sheldon Bishop of London (3).

The Parliament meeting the 16th of March, the King, in a Speech to both Houses; demanded a repeal of the Triennial Act made in 1641. To come to this demand, he enlarged on the late conspiracy, which he said was still on foot, and that there were men, who, on pretence that this Parliament was at an end by some clause in the Triennial Bill, fancied they might assemble themselves and chuse new members. He desired the two Houses not to leave an Act in being, which passed in a time very uncaredful for the dignity of the Crown, or security of the People. Lastly, he told them, he loved Parliaments: That never King was so much beholden to them as himself, nor did he believe the Crown could ever be happy without frequent Parliaments: But he would never suffer a Parliament to come together by the means prescribed by that bill. He then told them, that the four subsidies granted the last session, had fallen very short of what he expected, or they intended: That the revenues of the Excise, and Tunnage and Poundage were greatly diminished by the frauds of brewers and merchants, and the tax upon Chimnies declined, the last half year having brought in less than the former. He therefore prayed them to let him have the collecting of this tax by his own officers.

The Commons returning to their own House, proceeded immediately upon a Bill to repeal the Triennial Act, and made another in its room, namely, That the sitting of Parliaments should not be discontinued above three years at most. This Bill being ready, and passed by the Lords, the King came to their House the 5th of April, and gave it the royal assent.

The King had sometime since resolved upon a war with at it is difficult to know the true motive of this For the causes alledged were only general, except the taking of two ships in the East-Indies, valued at the most but at eight or ten thousand pounds Sterling.

 Some English Historians are to be credited, the King had no thoughts of this war: The Dutch, were the aggressors, and being encouraged by promise of great assistance from France, fought a quarrel with England. They also pretend, it was solely at the pressing instances of the Parliament, that the King was drawn into this war, to revenge the wrongs and damages done by the Dutch to the English in India, Africa and elsewhere. But as these Historians defend not to particulars, but keep to generals, the Reader would be very ill informed, if he adhered only to what they say. I shall therefore relate here what I meet with in others, who more fully explain this affair.

The 27th of April 1662, the States-general of the United Provinces made a treaty with the King of France, by which both parties engaged to assist one another, in case of any attack upon either in Europe. The same year they made a like treaty of league and alliance with the King of England. This had relation to another made in 1659, between England and the States before the King's restoration, and seemed to be renewed only to remove the defect of that of 1659, made on the part of England by an unlawful authority. However, it happened, in the interval between the two treaties, that the Dutch had sunk or taken in the Indies two English ships, called the Bonadventure and the Good-Hope, which occasioned a misunderstanding between the two nations (1). The English pretended, these two ships were attacked without any just cause, and the Hollanders maintained the contrary. In the treaty of 1662, the affair of these two ships was again debated; but as their value was inconsiderable, it was not thought proper to delay a treaty advantageous to both nations. It was therefore agreed, that the English should be allowed to prosecute the process commenced on account of these ships, and the States deposited fourscore thousand Florins by way of security to pay the full value in case the affair was decided against them. Some time after, another dispute arose upon the same subject, and this was, the King pretended, that the States-General were judges of this process, to which the States replied, that it belonged to the cognizance of the Admiralty of Amsterdam, who only had a right to decide it. The affair remained in this state till April this year 1664, when the Commons, after an inquiry into the obstructions of the trade of the nation, voted, and obtained the concurrence of the Lords to their vote,

 His Answer.
 Apr 27, 28.
 Edward.

"That the wrongs, dishonours, and indignities done to his Majesty by the Subjects of the United Provinces in India, Africa, and elsewhere; and the damages done by them to the English Merchants, are the greatest obstructions of the trade of England. That the same be speedily presented to his Majesty, and he be moved to take some effectual course for redress of these injuries, and all other of the like nature, and for prevention of the like for the future. And in prosecution thereof, they will with their lives and fortunes assist his Majesty, against all opposition whatsoever." In pursuance of this resolution, the two Houses presented, the same day, an address to the King, to which, on the morrow, they received this answer in writing, "That he was pleased with their zeal for the advancement of trade, and the removal of all obstructions which might hinder the same; being convinced, that nothing would more contribute to the honour of the nation, and the prosperity of his People.
 "That he would examine the particular complaints which had been represented to his Parliament, and order his Minister in Holland to demand speedy reparation, and in case of a denial, he relied on their promise and declaration to stand by him."

It is easy to see, that no particulars were specified either in the address or the answer, and that hitherto all was confined to generals. It will afterwards appear, that the English always kept to the same expressions, till the negotiation of the peace, when they were obliged to declare wherein consisted the injuries they complained of, the principal of which was found to be the loss of the two ships before-mentioned. It is now time to show, that when these complaints were brought to the Parliament, the King had already resolved on the war, and that these complaints were only designed to furnish a pretence, and engage the Parliament to grant him the necessary supplies to support it.

Since the treaty of 1662, the States had great cause of complaints against the Algerines, notwithstanding the peace concluded with them in 1661. England was no less concerned than the States in the depredations committed by the Algerines upon all sorts of ships, and therefore the State desired the King of England to join a squadron of his ships with a Fleet they were equipping, to oblige the Algerines to a more exact observation of the peace. The King answered, he had rather act separately.

After this answer, the States sent Ruyter into the Mediterranean, with a squadron of twelve ships, and the King sent thither a fleet of twenty sail under the command of Lawfon. These two fleets departed in May this year, and about the same time the Duke of York, as Governor of the Royal African Company, sent Vice-Admiral Holms to Cape Verd, with a squadron of fourteen men of war, to take all possible advantage against the Dutch East-India Company. Lawfon meeting Ruyter in the Mediterranean, was saluted by the Dutch Admiral, but returned not the compliment, contrary to what had been stipulated in the treaty of 1662. It is not necessary to take notice here of the little success Lawfon and Ruyter had against the Algerines. What Holms did at Cape Verd is much more im-material.

In the months of August and September, Holms made himself master of Fort St. Andrews, and most other places belonging to the Dutch in the neighbourhood of Cape Verd, and, after taking the fort built on the Cape itself, he gave it the name of York. He erected a fort in the mouth of the river Gambia, and then sailing for Guinea, seized all the forts the Dutch had on that coast, except Fort Achin and Fort St. George de Mina. After this, he returned to England. Now, if it be considered, that Holms sailed from England in May, or, at the latest, in June: that some time was required to equip this fleet, and that the Parliament's address was presented to the King but the 27th of April, it will be easily perceived, that the war was resolved in England before any complaints of depredations committed by the Dutch were represented to the Parliament, and that these complaints were only pretences for the war. It must be observed, that not a single English Historian speaks of the hostilities committed by Holms at Cape Verd and Guinea, long before any declaration of war (2).

But what clearly shows, the King, since his restoration, had ever intended this war, is his conduct whilst the treaty between France and the States was negotiating at Paris: for he did his utmost to obstruct it. The principal condition of this treaty consisted, in a reciprocal guaranty of what the two parties possessed, or should afterwards lawfully acquire. In this general clause, the States comprehended the article of the fishery, as an essential article, and the King of France made no objection to it. But Charles opposed it, and endeavoured to hinder the King of France from agreeing to that article. Levis, in compliance to Charles, sought expedients to satisfy him, by confining himself to a general guarantee, which should include all without exception. But the States refused to conclude the treaty, unless the article of the fishery was expressly inserted in the guaranty. Charles finding, the King of France would at last consent, ordered Count d'Esbrades, the French Ambassador at London, to be told, that he had resolved to oblige the ships of all nations without exception to strike to his. But perceiving, the King of France, instead of being intimidated by this menace, answered it in a high strain, he let him know, he would desist from this pretension as to him, provided he would desist from the guaranty of the fishery in favour of the Dutch. But Levis, being sensible, the Dutch would never recede from that particular clause, agreed to it at last, and the treaty was concluded.

Hence it appears, that Charles was then seeking a quarrel with the Dutch, on the article of the fishery. But finding, France had expressly engaged to be guaranty of it, he himself concluded, that very year, a treaty of alliance with the Dutch, in expectation of some other occasion to begin a war with them.

This design was no longer deferred, than till the beginning of this year 1664, when a fleet was preparing in England, to act at Cape Verd, and in Guinea, under the command of Holms. Shortly after, some English Merchants complained to the Parliament of the horrible depredations of the Dutch. But it was never known wherein consisted the injuries received by the English. This extraordinary proceeding is a clear evidence, the Court was in good understanding with those who complained to the Parliament. For, naturally, and according to the usual practice in such cases, they should have first brought their com-

1664. complaints to the King, who should have applied to the States for redress, and, in case of refusal, demanded the assistance of his Parliament. But here the order was inverted. The Parliament was first addressed to, who prayed the King to demand immediate reparation, and offered their assistance to carry on a war against the States, before it was known, whether these complaints had any foundation, or whether the States were inclinable to repair the pretended damages. All this demonstrates, the war was resolved, before the Parliament was informed of the causes and grounds of it. For it was May before the King, by his Ambassador Downing (1), demanded of the States reparation for these pretended injuries.

What I have been saying, is farther confirmed by the Speaker's Speech to the King, at the prorogation of the Parliament, wherein he said, the House, upon examination of the reasons of the decay of trade, had found, that the Dutch, within a few years, had spoiled his Subjects, to the value of seven or eight hundred thousand pounds, though Downing had not yet presented his Memorial to the States, nor, consequently, received any answer.

The 17th of May, the King coming to the Parliament, the Speaker presented the Bills which were ready, and amongst the rest, one for empowering the King to levy the Chimney-money by his own officers, as he had desired. This Bill was afterwards the cause of great vexations, complaints, and murmurs, which obliged King William III. to drop this tax, though, as it was levied in the reigns of Charles II. and James II. it amounted to above two hundred and fifty six thousand pounds a year. After the Speaker had mentioned this Bill, he told the King:

"— Whilt we were intent upon these weighty affairs, we were often interrupted by petitions, and letters, and motions, representing the unsettled condition of some counties, by reason of Phanatics, Sectaries, and Non-conformists: They differ in their shapes and species, and accordingly are more or less dangerous, but in this they all agree, they are no friends to the established Government either in Church or State, and if the old rule be true, Qui Ecclesiae contradicit non est pacificus, we have great reason to prevent their growth, and to punish their practice. To this purpose, we have prepared a Bill against their frequenting of Conventicles, the feed-plots and nurseries of their opinions, under pretence of religious worship. The first offence is made punishable with five pounds, or three months imprisonment, and ten pounds for a Peer: The second offence with ten pounds, or six months imprisonment, and twenty pounds for a Peer: But the third offence, after a trial by a Jury, and the trial of a Peer by his Peers, the party convicted shall be transported to some foreign Plantation, unless he lays down an hundred pounds. Immediabile quibus Enje rescindendum ne pars sincera trabatur."

The Presbyterians were more numerous than all the other Sects together. Since the King's reformation, they had never been accused of an infurrection against the Government, or of entering into the plots of the Anabaptists and Republicans; and yet, by this Act they were made liable to the same penalties as the other Sects; and, on pretence that their religious meetings were nurseries of their opinions against the Government in Church and State, they deserved to be transported to America, if they had the boldness to assemble three times. It seems, that by this extreme rigour, it was not so much designed to punish their pretended transgressions, as to drive them to despair, that they might render themselves guilty indeed.

After passing these Acts, the King prorogued the Parliament to August, signifying withal, that it should not meet till November, unless a certain affair obliged him to assemble it sooner.

This affair was the Dutch war, which the King had resolved. For this purpose, Downing presented to the States a Memorial, drawn in very high terms, wherein he demanded, on the part of the King, reparation for the damages done to the English, which, by his calculation, amounted to seven or eight hundred thousand pounds Sterling. After the most diligent search, I have not been able to discover the particular Articles of these damages, except the two ships before-mentioned, and another article concerning the life of Poleyn, of which I shall speak hereafter. Wherefore, in imitation of the English Historians, I am forced to leave the Reader in the dark, with regard to the particulars of the damages on which this war was founded.

The King was bent on a war at any rate, whilst the States used all possible endeavours to avoid it. Nevertheless, not judging it proper to treat with Downing, who behaved to them with great haughtiness, they laid in answer to his Memorial, that they would send an Ambassador to the King. Accordingly, they dispatched Van Goch, who had his first audience of the King the 25th of June. As he was speaking, at this audience, of the trade of Africa, and the West-Indies, the King interrupted him, and said, it was not to be suffered, that the Dutch Wegl-India Company should pretend, by means of three or four Ships, and a few forts on the coast of Guinea, to exclude other nations from that commerce. The Ambassador answered, the difficulties about that affair were terminated by the last treaty, and it ought to be examined, whether the Dutch had acted contrary to it. Afterwards, the States being informed of the hostilities committed by Holms at Cape Verd, and in Guinea, their Ambassador complained to the King, who answered, he had not the least knowledge thereof. Some days after, the Ambassador presented a large Memorial on that subject, with a fresh complaint, that the King had forbid the importation of Dutch commodities into England. The King gave the same answer, as before, to the first article of this Memorial, that he had no knowledge of what was acting by Holms; and to the second, that the prohibition of commodities, was upon the account of the Plague then reigning in Holland. It appeared afterwards, that the King pretended, the affair of Cape Verd and Guinea did not concern him, but was a private difference between the English and Dutch Companies, and therefore it had not been necessary to inform him of it. But it will hardly be conceived, that the Duke of York, as Governor of the Royal African Company, should send a fleet of twenty-one Men of War to Guinea without the King's knowledge.

While Downing at the Hague, and Van Goch at London, separately presented Memorials upon Memorials, the King was diligently equipping his fleet. As he wanted money (2), he borrowed one hundred thousand pounds of the city of London, who willingly lent him that sum, in the belief, that he intended only the good of the English trade, by the destruction of that of Holland. The States, on their side, prepared for their defence, but not with the same vigour that their enemies were preparing to attack them. Their design was to gain time, in hopes, their fleets of Merchantmen would return before the declaration of war; and the King's intention was to intercept those fleets before the publishing of any declaration.

The King discovered his design in a manner not to be mistaken. For sending his fleets to sea, under the command of the Duke of York, as High-Admiral (3), this fleet met, in November, with the Dutch Beurdeaux fleet, homeward bound, laden with wine and brandy, and took one hundred and thirty ships, which were brought into England, and condemned for lawful prizes, though no war had yet been proclaimed. It is needless to reflect on the King's conduct, or on the judgment of the English Admiralty. Every unprejudiced person will easily believe, that the Law of Nations was never more unjustly, or more manifestly violated. In vain do some Historians endeavour to palliate this action with two reasons, which discover by their weakness, how much they themselves were persuaded of the reality of this injustice. The first is, that about the same time, Ruyter dispossessed the English of their Factories at Cape Verd, and on the coast of Guinea. But, first, they take no notice, that these Factories were mere usurpations of the English, who had the same year dispossessed the Dutch of them. Secondly, Ruyter did not recover the forts at Cape Verd, and on the coast of Guinea, till the following year 1665. For it must be considered, that Holms committed his hostilities at Cape Verd, in the months of August and September, and afterwards sailed to the coast of Guinea, where he seized several forts. This news must therefore be brought to Holland, the States must send to Ruyter in the Mediterranean to repair the Streights, and sail to Cape Verd; and lastly, Ruyter must execute his orders, and the news of his expedition be carried to England. Now if all this cannot be effected within the space of six weeks, how is it possible to justify the taking of the Beurdeaux fleet in November, on account of Ruyter's expedition to Cape Verd and Guinea, three months after? The second reason is, that this war was not the project of the King, but the voice of the People and Parliament; as if, even on this supposition, the People and Parliament were less obliged than the King to observe the Law of Nations. But this was not the only fault of this nature committed by Charles II. through a desire of money.

Mean time, the King of France apprehending he should at last be involved in this war by assisting the States, pursuant to the treaty of 1662, believed it incumbent upon him to use some endeavours to prevent it, and to that end offered his mediation to the two Parties. The States willingly accepted it, but it was rejected by Charles, who said, he would enter into no negotiation till he had received entire satisfaction on his demands. He had now sent Sir Richard Fanshawe to Spain, and the Lord Holles to France, to endeavour to ingage these two Crowns in a war with the Dutch. But he succeeded neither at Paris nor Madrid. Nevertheless, he persisted in his resolution, to make war, though he had no other reasons to allege for it than the pretended depredations committed by the Dutch upon the English, the particulars of which were never known to this day.

When it is considered, with what animosity this war was undertaken and pursued, not only by the King, the Duke of York, and the Ministry, but even by the Parliament, one can hardly help thinking, that they who excited this animosity, had some other secret end than that of supporting trade. But hitherto, conjectures only have been offered on this subject. Some say, this war ought to be ascribed to the Duke of York's ambition, who was impatient to distinguish himself, by commanding, as Lord High-Admiral, the King his brother's fleet. Others believe, the King finding his coffers empty, notwithstanding all the money given him by Parliament, and that raised by the sale of Dunkirk, engaged by his intrigues the Parliament to propose this war to him, to have a pretence of demanding extraordinary supplies, which should not be all expended in the war. There are others who believe, the King, the Parliament, the City of London, found this war absolutely necessary to humble the maritime power of the Dutch, who aimed to engross the whole commerce of Europe, as they had already done that of the Indies: That tho' the causes of the war were never fully made known, every one understood, it was a war occasioned by the jealousy of trade. Lastly, there are who suspect, that the project to introduce Popery into England being now formed, the execution of it was only suspended till the Dutch were rendered unable to succour the English Protestants, since it was only from them that they could receive assistance. I shall not take upon me to determine what were the secret motives of this war, which certainly was undertaken on very slight grounds, as will hereafter more fully appear (1).

The Parliament meeting the 24th of November, after two prorogations, the King made a Speech to both Houses upon the present affair, namely, the war with the States-General. He said, that upon the stock of his own credit he had fed out a fleet, not inferior to any, England had ever seen, and which had cost him eight hundred thousand pounds. All this tended to demand of the Commons a proportionable supply. He then added,

"I know not whether it will be worth my pains to endeavour to remove a vile jealousy which some ill men scatter abroad, and which I am sure will never sink into the breast of any man who is worthy to sit upon your benches; That when you have given me a vote and proportionable Supply for the support of the war, I may be induced by some evil Counsellors (for they will be thought to think very respectfully of my own person) to make a sudden peace, and get all that money for my own private passions. I am sure you all think it an unworthy jealousy, and not to deserve an answer. I would not be thought to have so brutish an inclination to love war for war's sake. God knows, I desire no blessing in the world so much, as that I may live to see a firm peace between all Christian Princes and States. But let me tell you, and you may be confident of it, That when I am compelled to enter into a war, for the protection, honour, and benefit of my Subjects, I will, God willing, not make a peace, but upon the obtaining and securing those ends for which the war is entered into: And when that can be done, no good man will be sorry for the determination of it."

It will be seen hereafter, how the King discharged his promise in this Speech. After he had done, he farther declared to them, That he did intend the Lord-Chancellor should have made a Narrative concerning the Treaty and manner of proceeding with the Dutch; but the Chancellor being laid up with the gout (2), he had ordered the Narrative to be put into writing, which was delivered to both Houses.

It will be easily imagined, this Narrative contained only what should inflame the Parliament. But the Historians have not been pleas'd to relate the Contents, perhaps for want of knowing them. Be this as it will, the King found the Parliament so well disposed in his favour, that the two Houses, by six Lords and twelve Commons, sent their thanks to the City of London for their loan to the King. A few days after, the Commons voted the King a supply of two millions five hundred thousand pounds, towards the maintenance of a war so necessary to the State; and in less than three weeks, Ways and Means were found for raising that Sum in three years; after which both Houses adjourned to the 12th of January.

Immediately after, the King published a declaration, by which General Reprials were granted against the Ships, Goods, and Subjects of the States-General, and the Court of Admiralty order'd to condemn them as prizes according to the Court of Admiralty, and Law of Nations. This declaration was founded upon the grievous damages and insults done to the English, but without specifying one article.

When the Bourdeaux fleet had been seized and condemned, the English took all the Dutch Ships they met, tho' the war was not yet proclaimed. But it was much worse since the declaration for general reprials had been publish'd.

When the States were informed of the hostilities committed by Holms at Cape Verd and in Guinea, they sent an express to Ruyter, to order him to repair the Streights, and sail towards these coasts, to recover what the Dutch West-India Company had lost. Ruyter executed this order with great vigour, and retook most of the forts seized by the English. He likewise took several of their Ships. This news reached London the beginning of February, and furnish'd the King with a new pretence for the declaration of war, which was published in a few days.

The Parliament meeting the 12th of January, the House of Commons proceeded immediately to the Money-Bill, as the most pressing affair. This Bill being ready, the King came to the House to give his assent, after which, War was formally declared against the States-General. This declaration was founded upon the numberless injuries and unspeakable damages, the English had suffered from the Dutch, without being able to obtain the least reparation. The King added, That the Ships belonging to the Dutch were order'd not only to abandon the Confortship against the Algerines, to which he had been invited by the States, but also to use all Acts of Depredation against his Subjects in Africa. He therefore declared to all the World, that the Dutch were the Aggressors, and ought in justice to be so looked upon by all men.

What is very astonishing in this declaration is, that the King did not even take care to preserve appearances, as if his Subjects and all Europe had been void of common sense, or it was not known that the fleet from Bourdeaux had been intercepted in November, before Ruyter had reached Guinea. He pretended, that all the World must be ignorant, because he himself feign'd not to know, that Holms had begun hostilities at Cape Verd and in Guinea in August and September. In short, he would have all the World, believe on his bare word, that the English had suffered grievous damages, without his vouching to specify one single injury. This declaration was approv'd by twenty two Privy-Counsellors only, the Earls of Southampton and Clarendon having been either unable, or unwilling to be present when it was resolv'd. It was dated the 22d of February, but was not publish'd till the 2d of March.

The King having notice that some bills were ready for the royal Assent, came to the Parliament the 2d of March, and after passing the bills, which were of no great importance, he prorogued the Parliament to the 21st of June. Afterwards, he continued the prorogation to the 1st of August, and then to the 9th of October.

In this session the Clergy voluntarily resigned their right of taxing themselves in Convocation, and from this time have been taxed in common with the People in Parliament. This has made Convocations less necessary to the King, and consequently less considerable in themselves (3).

The war being declared, the Duke of York, in the end of March, 1665.

(1) Some say, he was very positively assured by Statesmen of both sides, that the French set this War on in a very artificial manner; for while they were thus engaged, they would be sure to pull the Dutch into the war, and as they put them in hopes that a support would be given them, they would be sure to pull the Dutch into the war, and as they put them in hopes that a support would be given them, they would be sure to pull the Dutch into the war. There was no such thing as a support. France and Popery were the true springs of their Councils. It was the interest of the King of France, that the States should be in a state of perpetual war, and that they should be so weak, that they should be unable to invade them, or fall into Flanders. The French also thus set on the war between the English and Dutch, hoping that their fleets would mutually weaken one another in such, that the naval force of France, which was increasing very considerably, would be near an equality to theirs, when they should be flattered by a War. The States were I believe the greatest strength of the Protestant Interest, and it is very probable, that this dissension was more political than real; for he was utterly against this war, as was also the Earl of Shaftesbury.

1665. March, repaired to the fleet which he was to command, consisting of one hundred and seven men of war, and fourteen fire-ships. But as the fleet was not yet ready, he could not sail till May.

The King of France's conduct with regard to the war between England and France.
Some time since, the States, perceiving a war unavoidable, had pressed the King of France to declare against England, pursuant to the treaty of 1662, but had not yet prevailed. Charles on his side solicited him to abandon the States, and allured him with very tempting advantages. So, Lewis was not a little embarrassed. He was desirous to keep fair with the King of England, whom, he foresaw, he might want; and, on the other hand, if he abandoned the States, there was danger of their being overcome, and of Penfionary De Wit losing all his credit. This could not happen, without a change of the Government, the re-establishment of the young Prince of Orange, and the King of England's being in effect master in Holland. It was through the sole influence of the Penfionary that the States were attached to the interests of France, and consequently his fall could not but be extremely prejudicial to that Kingdom. The course therefore which Lewis took on this occasion, was to gain time, one while by cavilling at the terms of the treaty of 1662, another while, by giving hopes to the States of his declaring against England, and lastly, by a splendid Embassy to London, with the Duke of Verneuil at the head of it, to mediate a peace between England and Holland. In order to know his situation, let us hear what he says himself in a letter to Count d'Eftrades his Ambassador at the Hague, dated the 19th of December 1664.

"However, I own, I am a little embarrassed, considering, if I literally execute the treaty of 1662, I shall very much prejudice my principal interest, and this, in favour of a nation, which not only will never be servicable to me, but which I shall find opposite in the only case where I should want them, and then, the assistance I shall have given them, will turn against me. Besides this, I lose England, which is upon the point of concluding a strict alliance with Spain, in case I reject her offers, and these offers, for I may trust you with the secret, are a carte blanche in every thing I can desire for the Netherlands, without one inch of land expected for England. Besides the King of England himself suggests to me, how to avoid with honour assisting the Dutch. He pretends, they are the aggressors: that he has a right to the forts, they have seized in Guinea: that they first armed: that they have made a national quarrel for a private dispute between two Companies, which they should have been suffered to decide: that they committed the first act of violence in ill-treating one of his ships laden with masts from Sweden. That however, I am only engaged for what passes in Europe: That it is visible all the differences, except that of Guinea, are easy to be adjusted. That it is not reasonable, their capricious obstinacy to maintain a Country for which I am not engaged, should kindle a war in these parts, because as I am not obliged for the principal, I cannot be so for the accessions and dependencies. I omit how I was served by the States at Munster, &c. What I now write must be a secret.

Reflections upon this Letter.

I cannot forbear making some remarks on this letter. First it shows, the King of France did not excite the war between England and Holland, as most of the English Historians pretend.

Secondly, if Charles had really intended the welfare of his Kingdom in undertaking this war, he would not have offered the King of France a carte blanche for the Netherlands, in order to accomplish the destruction of Holland. This was a thing directly contrary to the interests of England, and very different from the satisfaction demanded for the injuries, his Subjects might have received from the Dutch.

Thirdly, in what Charles alledged to Lewis, there appears no proof, that the Dutch were the aggressors, nor any thing of the pretended damages of eight hundred thousand pounds: But that the principal point in dispute was the propriety of some forts on the coast of Guinea, which, according to him, was an affair between the two Companies, and that the rest was easy to be adjusted.

Fourthly, Charles supposes the States to have made it a national quarrel, by sending Ruyter to Guinea; but that he had not concerned himself with this affair, because Lawfon had been sent with twenty-one sail, in the name of the Duke of York, and the Royal African Company.

Lastly, the States had no reason to expect much assistance from France, unless the chance of war should render it necessary for them, or the King of France find some considerable advantage in espousing their quarrel.

It was therefore to gain time that the Ambassador was sent to London, because Lewis pretended, that as long as there was any hope of an accommodation, he was not obliged to declare against England. Now whilst his Ambassadors were at London, he could say, that the hope of a reconciliation was not entirely desperate. He managed so artfully, that he kept them there till the end of the year 1665, declared not against England till January 1666, and his declaration was of little service to the States.

The Duke of York sailed with the English fleet in May, and before the Dutch could be ready, alarmed the coasts of Holland. He continued a fortnight near the Texel, to prevent the fleet of Holland from joining that of Zealand, in which he could not fail of success. In the mean time, he took several Dutch homeward bound ships, who had not been informed of the war. However, as the war was not made only to hinder this junction, the Duke at last sailed away with design to meet Ruyter, who was returning to Holland by order of the States. But finding, his provisions were consumed upon an uncertain expectation, he retired with his fleet to Harwich, contenting himself with sending some frigates to cruise in the Channel, and bring him intelligence of the enemy (1).

Mean while, the Holland and Zealand Squadrons joined and formed a fleet of one hundred and twenty one men of war, besides fire-ships, under the command of Obdam de Wassenaar. He had under him Cortenaar Vice Admiral of the Maese, Evertzen Vice Admiral of Zealand, and Cornelius Tromp son of the famous Martin Tromp. The Rear-Admirals and Captains were very far from answering to their superiors in capacity, more care having been taken to fill these posts with the relations and friends of those, whom the Penfionary wanted to preserve his credit, than with experienced officers. So, except fifteen or sixteen Captains, the rest were unexperienced. This is a misfortune to which Republicks are more liable than Monarchies. Though De Wit managed the affairs as he pleased, he had for enemies all the Party of the House of Orange, who were spies upon his conduct, and misrepresented all his proceedings, in order to ruin him. The Penfionary was not ignorant of it, and therefore believed, the only way to secure himself, and preserve his authority, was to hazard a Sea engagement. Success would disarm the malice of his enemies, and the loss of a battle would of course oblige the French to execute the Treaty of 1662, and silence the complaints and murmurs of the Orange Party, who industriously published, that Lewis only amused the States. Agreeably to this resolution, which the Penfionary caused the States to approve, an order was sent to Obdam, to go in quest of the enemy. He obeyed, and came in sight of them the 1st of June, not far from Harwich. But the wind being southerly, and the next morning fourth-west, he retired to the mouth of the Maese. He acquainted the States by an express, with the reason of his retreat, and that he did not think proper to attack the English while they had the advantage of the wind. But he received still more positive orders to fight let the wind be as it would, on peril of answering it with his head. After so express an order, there being no way to recede, he weighed anchor at break of day, and within an hour discovered the English fleet divided into three squadrons. The first under the Red Flag, was commanded by the Duke of York, assisted by Penn and Lawfon. The second being the White Squadron, was conducted by Prince Rupert, assisted by Minnes and Sampson. The third which was the Blue Squadron, was commanded by the Earl of Sandwich, who had with him Cuttings, and Sir George Aysough.

I shall not pretend to describe this engagement, fought the 3d of June, for which I own myself unequalled. I shall therefore only say, the Dutch fleet was overthrown, chiefly by the ill conduct of several Captains who were wanting in their duty; by the death of Obdam, who with his ship and all his men were blown up; by the loss of Cortenaar who was killed upon the deck after hoisting the Admiral-Flag, and by many other causes which are scarce intelligible but to those who are versed in sea-affairs.

after, to tax the Church-Benefices, as temporal Estates were taxed; which proved indeed a lighter burden, but was not so honourable as when it was given by themselves. Yet interest prevailing above the point of honour, they acquiesced in it. So the Conventions being no more necessary to the Crown, this made that there was less regard had to them afterwards. They were often discontinued and prorogued; and when they met, it was only for form. Burnet, p. 197. The custom of the Clergy's taxing themselves was broken during the late troubles. For then the Clergy, either out of voluntary compliance, or situation of Popularity, or because they wanted Proxies, to represent their Body, had their Benefices taxed with the Laity. Thus the Court found, after the Restoration, to be an easier thing, than to have two bodies of Men to please. And therefore intended to deprive the Clergy of that right, if they had not voluntary relinquished it.

1665. The Dutch lost nineteen ships burnt and sunk, with about six thousand men (1). On the English side, the loss was only of four ships, and about fifteen hundred men, among whom were Charles Berkley Earl of Pembroke, Admiral Sampon, James Ley Earl of Marlborough, and Vice-Admiral Lawson, who died shortly after of his wounds (2). The remains of the Dutch fleet retired to the Muse or the Texel, and were pursued all the next day being Sunday, though, according to some, the Duke of York did not in this pursuit, discover the same ardour he had shown in the battle. See what Doctor Burnet Bishop of Salisbury says of it in his posthumous History of his own times.

p. 218.

That famous Historian says, "After the fight, a Council of war was called to concert the method of action when they should come up with them. In that Council, Penn, who commanded under the Duke, happened to say, that they must prepare for hotter work in the next engagement. He knew well the courage of the Dutch was never so high as when they were desperate. The Earl of Montague, who was then a volunteer, and one of the Duke's Court, said to me, it was very visible that made an impression: And all the Duke's domesticks said, he had got honour enough: Why should he venture a second time? The Dutchess had also given a strict charge to all the Duke's servants to do all they could to hinder him to engage too far. When matters were settled, they went to sleep; and the Duke ordered a call to be given him when they should get up to the Dutch fleet. It is not known what passed between the Duke and Brouncker, who was of his bed-chamber, and was then in waiting; but he came to Penn as from the Duke, and said, the Duke ordered the sail to be slackened. Penn was struck with the order, but did not go to argue the matter with the Duke himself, as he ought to have done, but obeyed it. When the Duke had slept, he upon his waking went out upon the quarter-deck, and seemed amazed to see the sails slackened, and that thereby all hope of overtaking the Dutch was lost. He questioned Penn upon it. Penn put it on Brouncker, who said nothing. The Duke denied he had given any such order. But he neither punished Brouncker for carrying it, nor Penn for obeying it. He indeed put Brouncker out of his service, and it was said, that he durst do no more, because he was so much in the King's favour and in the Mitre's. Penn was more in his favour after that than ever before, which he continued to his son after him, though a Quaker. And it was thought, that all that favour was to oblige him to keep the secret. Lord Montague did believe, that the Duke was struck, seeing the Earl of Palmouth the King's favorite, and two other persons of quality killed very near him, and that he had no mind to engage again, and that Penn was privately with him. If Brouncker was so much in fault as he seemed to be, it was thought the Duke, in the passion that this must have raised in him, would have proceeded to greater extremities, and not have acted with so much phlegm."

Num. m.

The Duke of York seeing, it was in vain to continue his pursuit, retired to the coasts of England, and repaired to Whitehall to receive the acclamations of the Court and City of London. The King appointed a day of thanksgiving throughout the Kingdom for this victory, and several Medals were struck in honour of the victorious Duke of York, who was now in a very agreeable situation (3). For besides that he was Lord High-Admiral, Governour of the Cinque-Ports, and of Portsmouth, and had the benefit of the Post-Office, and the Wine-Licences, all which enabled him to keep a splendid Court, he had still a much more considerable advantage. He began to be considered as Heir to the Crown, the King his Brother having no children by his Queen. This attached many to him, and particularly the Papists, who knew his Religion, though he yet concealed it as well as the King.

Shortly after, the Queen-Mother having resolved to pass the residue of her days in France, the King and the Duke of York attended her [in the Catherine Yatch] to the Nore, and there took their last leave of her. It is very likely, she was not pleased with having so small a share in the publick affairs, having been used to the contrary in the reign of the King her Husband.

However glorious this first Sea fight of the Duke of York might be, the King and Council did not think it proper he should venture his Person in a second engagement. Therefore the command of the fleet was given to [Edward Montague] Earl of Sandwich (4), who, with his utmost endeavours to prepare it for the Sea as soon as possible, in order to prevent That of the States, which was repairing with all possible diligence. Besides, the States, having appointed Ruyter to succeed Obdam, ordered him to return immediately with the fleet, consisting of seventeen men of war. The diligence w'd by the States to repair their fleet, was not so much to be reveng'd of the English, as to secure their Merchant-men home-ward bound from Smyrna and the East-Indies. The English, on their side were less desirous to fight than to seize the riches which those fleets were bringing to Holland.

It happened, in the mean time, that the Dutch-Smyrna-Sea fleet, and several East-India Ships not daring to enter the Channel, retired to the port of Berghen in Norway. Being waiting for Ruyter to convey them to Holland. Mean while, the King of Denmark, discounting one day with Sir Gilbert Talbot, the English Envoy, made great complaints of the Dutch, who, he said had drawn the Swedish war on him, that he might be forced to have recourse to them for supplies of money and ships, and deliver to them the Customs of Norway and the Sound for its security. Upon this the Envoy told him, he had now a good opportunity of being reveng'd, by the seizure of their ships at Berghen, worth many millions. But the King answering, he wanted strength to execute such a design, the Envoy told him, he doubted not but the King of England would lend him his ships, provided he was assured of equal partaking of the spoil; to which the King of Denmark consented. The King of England was pleased with Talbot's project, and sent orders to the Earl of Sandwich to sail immediately and seize the Dutch ships at Berghen. The Admiral readily obeyed, though he had received no intimation of the agreement between the two Kings.

To effect this design, it was absolutely necessary to inform the Vice-roy of Norway, and the Governor of Berghen of it, that they might favour it, in feigning to protect the Dutch ships, the King of Denmark being unwilling to appear openly. Nor was it less necessary to acquaint the Earl of Sandwich with it, to prepare him against the noise and complaints of the Governor of Berghen, on account of the attempt and violence of the English. But several accidents ruined this affair. The Governor of Berghen, who was to receive orders from the Vice-roy of Norway, was not informed soon enough. On the other hand, Talbot's express, sent from Copenhagen to the English fleet, was taken by the Dutch. In fine, the Earl of Sandwich hearing, Ruyter was shortly expected, and being desirous to perform the deed before his arrival, detached the squadron commanded by Sir Thomas Tyldeman, who attacked the Dutch with great resolution. But they had now had time to put themselves in a posture of defence. On the other hand, the Governor of Berghen, who had not yet received any particular directions how to behave, seeing this open hostility, and observing that the shot from the English damaged the town, fired upon them from the citadel. In a word, this squadron was almost entirely ruined, and obliged to return to the fleet. The next day, the 4th of August, orders came to the Governor of Berghen, but it was too late. It appeared, the King was not pleased with the Earl of Sandwich's conduct, since, instead of continuing him in the command of the fleet, he sent him Ambassador to the Court of Spain.

Mean while, Ruyter arriving in Holland with many English prizes, took the oath to the States as Vice-Admiral-General, after which he took the command of the fleet consisting of ninety-three ships well equipped. But though he bore the title of Admiral, three commissioners attended him, namely, De Wit the Pensionary, Huygens, and Borreel, who had properly the command. The grand design of these commissioners was to meet the India fleet, which was to sail round Ireland, to avoid entering into the Channel. But the wind was so contrary, that the fleet would not have got soon enough out of the Texel, if the Pensionary, who understood sea affairs very well, had

1. Our Historians say, That we lost but one Ship; and that the English took eighteen Dutch Men of War, and sunk and fired about fourteen more. They also took two thousand six hundred Prisoners, whereof sixteen were Captains. See Burchett, p. 398. Edward, Vol. 3. p. 134.

not by founding it himself all over very carefully, found more ways to get out by different winds, than was thought formerly practicable (1). So, the fleet at last failed out, and appeared before Berghen, where the commissioners gave their orders for conveying the merchant-men which were in that port. But it was not in their power to prevent a storm, which dispersed them, and threw twenty of them into the hands of the English (2). This storm obliged Ruyter and the commissioners to return to Holland, with their fleet very much damaged.

In the mean time, the Plague raged dreadfully in London, where it first appeared about the middle of May. It is said, that in less than a year, it swept away, in that single city, above a hundred thousand persons (3). The King at first retired to Hampton-Court, but afterwards, to be farther from London, resided at Salisbury.

It appears, that this year, the Republicans had projected an insurrection, and were even encouraged by emissaries from the States-General, who would have been glad to employ the King at home in domestic troubles. But this was a bare project, which served only to furnish the enemies of the Non-conformists with an opportunity to magnify the danger with which the Kingdom was threatened from the enemies of the Church in general, and to include, in that number, the Presbyterians, tho' they were not concerned in the republican Projects.

It was not only against England that the States-General had to defend themselves. Charles had raised them another enemy who had no less embarrased them. This was the famous Bernard Van Ghelen Bishop of Munster, who, upon very slight pretences, entered the Province of Over-sijl at the head of an army paid by the English. He made himself master of a great many small places, and then attempted to surprize Groningen, but was repulsed. At last, before the end of the campaign, the King of France, and the Dukes of Lunenburg having sent a powerful assistance to the States, the Bishop was forced to relinquish his great projects, and think of a peace, especially as the money promised by the King of England was not regularly paid.

The Parliament, which had been prorogued the 9th of October, met on the day appointed, but at Oxford, on account of the plague which still raged in London, whereas it did not much infect other parts of the Kingdom. In his Speech to both Houses, the King told them, the supply of two millions five hundred thousand pounds granted him for carrying on the war, was already spent. He insisted particularly on the great sums paid to the Bishop of Munster, for making a diversion in the bowels of his enemies country, though it appears in Sir William Temple's letters, that these sums were never well paid.

After the King had done speaking, the Chancellor by his order enlarged upon the same subject, to signify to the Commons, that they could not dispense with putting the King in a condition to prosecute a war so glorious and necessary. Then, he spoke of the design formed by the Republicans, for the subversion of the Government. But, in aggravating with great warmth and eloquence the efforts and designs of these men, he took particular care not to distinguish them from the other sects of Non-conformists. It was a constant artifice, as I have observed, to apply to the Presbyterians, under the general name of Non-conformists, all the actions and extravagances of the Independents, Anabaptists, and Republicans in general.

In a very few days, the Commons voted the King a new supply of twelve hundred and fifty thousand pounds to continue the war, and one hundred twenty thousand pounds to the Duke of York, for the great service he had done to the nation.

After this, was brought into the House a Bill, which passed without any difficulty, namely, "That no Non-conformist Teacher under what denomination soever, shall dwell, or come, unless upon the road, within five miles of any Corporation, or any other place where they had been Ministers, or had preached, after the Act of Oblivion, unless they first took the following oath." I do swear that it is not lawful upon any pretence whatsoever to take arms against the King; and that I do abhor the traitorous position of taking arms by his authority against his person, or against those that are commissioned by him, in pursuance of such Commissions; and that I will not at any time endeavour any alteration of Government either in Church or State (4).

The reason alledged in the Act to justify this severity was, that the Ministers had settled themselves in the Corporations, sometimes three or four in a place, and took opportunities to insinuate into the minds of the subjects, their poisonous principles of schism and rebellion, to the great danger of the Church and Kingdom.

This Bill met with great opposition in the House of Lords, even from the Earl of Southampton Lord Treasurer, though intimate friend of the Earl of Glarendon, principal author of the persecution against the Non-conformists (5). Indeed, the oath required to be taken by the Non-conforming Ministers supposed a thing, which was not generally allowed, namely, that every good Subject and good Christian, was obliged in conscience to believe what was contained in this oath, otherwise it was absurd to impose it on the Ministers. For there is a great difference between enjoying a certain practice, and obliging part of the Subjects to swear that they believe it founded in Religion and Conscience, while the rest are left free, either to believe or not believe it. Accordingly, the Commons, being aware of the force of so preising an objection, prepared a Bill to oblige all the subjects to take the same oath. But the Bill was thrown out, though only by two or three voices. At last, notwithstanding these difficulties, the Act, called the Five-mile-Act, passed in the House of Lords, and the King gave it the royal Assent the 31st of October, as well as to the Money-Bill and some others, after which he prorogued the Parliament to the 20th of February 1665/6.

Several Writers have endeavoured to justify the rigour of the Five-mile-Act, and what they have said amounts to this. — That this rigour was occasioned more by the seditious behaviour of the Non-conformists, than by the exercise of their Religion. In which assertion the ambiguity of the word Non-conformist is still retained, as if all the Sects included under that denomination formed but one and the same Body, united by the same common doctrines and interests, which is notoriously false. The Presbyterians alone were considerably more numerous than all the other Non-conformists together, and had doctrines and interests really separate from those of the other Sects. They could not be, nor were they, accused of being engaged in the conspiracies, real or pretended, of the Independents and Anabaptists since the King's restoration, who had even positively promised, they should not be molested for their Religion, after the great service they had done him. And yet, because their enemies had artfully included them in the general denomination of Non-conformists, they were to partake of the punishment due to the other Sects, who were called by the same name, though they had no sort of union with them. Wherefore, the Reader may judge, whether this severity did not partly arise from their religion. In short, by the sole ambiguity of the word Non-conformist, the objections and just complaints of the Presbyterians are pretended to be combated.

This same year, the Council of Scotland showed no less animosity against the Presbyterians. On pretence of some insolence committed by Alexander Smith, a private Minister, a Proclamation was published the 24th of December, ordering that all the silenced Presbyterian Ministers should, within forty days, remove themselves and their families from the places where they had been Ministers, and not reside within twenty miles of the same, or within six miles of Edinburgh, or any Cathedral Church, nor within three miles of any royal Borough, nor should be more than two together in the same parish, on pain of incurring the penalties of the Law against movers of sedition. I own, I see no other difference between sentencing men to death, and putting them out of a capacity to live, unless, that the latter punishment offers those who insist it a more exquisite vengeance. But this rigour will appear the more extreme, if it is considered that the Presbyterians made properly the body of the Scotch nation (6).

In the beginning of the year 1666, the King's affairs were in an ill situation. The King of France, prelied by the repeated instances of the States-General, recalled his Ambassadors, and published the 19th of January a declaration of war against England. This was not owing to his belief that the affairs of the States were desperate, (for the sequel showed they could defend themselves without his assistance) but because the Pensionary, who was entirely attached to his interest, could no longer support himself without this declaration, which, as will hereafter appear, was not very prejudicial to England.

On the other hand, the States found means to secure the King of Denmark, by the promise of paying him yearly, as long as the war with England should continue, fifteen hundred thousand Florins, three hundred thousand of which were to be paid by the King of France. For this Defor the service of the allies.

The States also raised so many enemies to the Bishop of Meaux, that he was obliged to retire. This peace was concluded at Chateau de Cambray the 18th of April.

The naval war was renewed in 1666, with all the disadvantages to England. If the King of France had acted with the sincerity, the States thought they had reason to expect, the English fleet would have been defeated. The English fleet, however, was not so easily overcome. The English fleet, under the command of the Duke of Beaufort, who, by accidents, real or pretended, arrived not at Belle-Isle till the end of September.

On the other hand, the King of Denmark without a junction of his fleet with that of the States, contented himself with guarding his own coasts. So, this year, as the last, the war by sea was carried on between England and the States only.

The King returning to London the 1st of February, proclaimed war against France [on the 10th.]

A few days before, the Queen miscarried, which entirely destroyed the common report that she was incapable of having children.

The command of the English fleet was given to Prince Rupert, the Duke of Albemarle (1). They remained till the 23d of April, but were not ready to sail till the end of May. It consisted of seventy-eight ships of the line, besides frigates and fireships. In all appearance, the King was still then ignorant of the French King's secret intentions. But he knew, the Duke of Beaufort had orders to repair to Belle-Isle with his fleet, said to consist of thirty-six sail, to join the Dutch fleet in the Channel. Wherefore, he sent express orders to Prince Rupert to sail with twenty great ships, and join ten more at Plymouth, in order to go in quest of the Duke of Beaufort, which the Prince immediately obeyed. It cannot well be denied, that this order was sent with too much precipitation, and without due consideration. For, besides, that the English fleet could, without danger, have waited for the French, which, in fact, was the case, the French fleet was in a narrow sea as the Channel, while the English should be in their station, the French fleet was yet in the Mediterranean, when the order was sent to Prince Rupert, and that of Holland upon the point of sailing out of their ports. The King had afterwards reason to see how unseasonably this order was given.

The fleet of the States commanded by Ruyter, put to sea with seventy-one ships of the line, twelve frigates, thirteen fire-ships, and eight yachts, and anchored between Newport and Dunkirk. Ruyter had under his particular conduct the squadron of the Mage: That of North Holland and Friesland was commanded by Evertzen, and that of Zealand by Tromp. The English having a fair wind, failed to attack the enemy, who, on their side, cut their cables to be the sooner ready to receive them. Tromp's ship was so disabled at the first, that he was obliged to leave it for another. The same thing happened to Ruyter, who was coming to his assistance, and the powder of a Dutch ship taking fire, she blew up into the air. Ruyter sunk an English ship of fifty guns, then another of seventy, and afterwards three others of the first rate. In short, this first day, the advantage was wholly on the side of the Dutch, except that they lost Vice-Admiral Evertzen, who was killed by a cannon-ball.

The fight, interrupted by the night, was renewed early the next morning, but after lasting some hours, was discontinued till noon by reason of a calm. After that, the wind rising, both fleets renewed the engagement with equal bravery. Tromp being once more obliged to change his ship, found himself so engaged in the English fleet, that he would have been infallibly taken or sunk, if Ruyter, by prodigious efforts, had not brought him off. This second day, the English had still the disadvantage, by losing eight of their largest ships either sunk or burnt, and six taken, with the George Admiral of the White.

The Duke of Albemarle would have taken the advantage of the night to retire, but was pursued too closely to execute his design. So that he was obliged to fight all the next day, as he retired towards his own shore. About the evening he discovered Prince Rupert's squadron coming to his assistance. Whereupon the two English Admirals attacked their enemies again the next morning. But this fourth day proved as unsuccessful to them as the three former. They lost four of their best ships, and were obliged to retreat with precipitation. A mist happily conveyed them from Rupert's pursuit. The English lost twenty-three great ships, besides several others of less note, six thousand men, and two thousand six hundred prisoners. Amongst the slain were Sir William Berkeley Vice-Admiral of the White squadron, and Sir Christopher Minnis. The Dutch lost six ships, two thousand eight hundred soldiers, and fourscore sailors, besides the Admiral, De Ruyter, De Witt, and De Witt, and several other officers. Though the victory was so evidently on the side of the Dutch, bonfires and rejoicings were made at London, as if the English had been conquerors (2).

The two fleets soon put to sea again, and as they were in quest of each other, they met the 24th of July, and fought a furious battle, where the victory was ultimately disputed. The English fleet consisted of above a hundred sail, nineteen fireships. While Ruyter, and young Evertzen, engaged the red and white squadrons, the long dispute routed the blue squadron, commanded by Sir Jeremy Smith. But by an unpardonable error, instead of remaining with the fleet, he amused himself with pursuing the flying ships of the enemy. On the other hand, young Evertzen, who commanded one of the Dutch squadrons, was killed with a cannon-ball, and his squadron entirely defeated. But the English Admiral who fought against him, was not guilty of the same error as Tromp. In pursuing the flying enemy, he joined the red squadron, commanded by Prince Rupert, and the Duke of Albemarle, and by means of the night, disengaged himself. But the next day, he was obliged to sustain the fight alone, and with these two squadrons, there being no news of Tromp. He never in his whole life showed so much bravery and capacity as in this second engagement. He sustained, with his single squadron, the brunt of the two English squadrons, and at last retreated with such wonderful conduct, that he gained more honour by it than he would have done by a victory.

The English leaving the chase in sight of Flyburgh, went after Tromp, who, though he was met off Harwich, recovered the Texel without any loss. Ruyter at his return, loudly complained of Tromp's conduct, and, to satisfy him, the States put Tromp under an arrest, dismissed him from his post, and put Fan Ghent in his place (3).

About the time of these engagements between the English and Dutch, the Duke of Beaufort arrived with his fleet at Rochelle, where he staid to take in fresh water, which he greatly wanted.

As in the last engagement the Dutch fleet was dispersed, part retiring to Flyburgh, and part to the Texel, the Duke of Albemarle finding himself master of the sea, detached Holland twenty men of war to brave the coasts of Holland. Holms, coming to the Isle of Vlye, burnt a hundred merchant ships, and two men of war designed for convoys. Then he advanced to the Isle of Schelling, and making a descent, burnt many houses in the little town of Brandaris. His design was to improve a treason carrying on in this Isle by one Hemskirk, for which Buat a French Gentleman, who secretly corresponded with the English, was beheaded at the Hague. But Holms not finding things ready as he expected, returned to the fleet.

After this expedition, the English fleet sailed into the Channel, and anchored at St. Helen's; the Isle of Wight being the most proper station for hindering the junction of the French and Dutch fleets. Ruyter on his side posted himself in St. John's bay, near Boulogne, where he was seized by a distemper, which for some time was believed mortal. This obliged the States to recall their fleet, of which they gave notice to the King of France.

Mean time, the Duke of Beaufort, ignorant of the retreat of the Dutch fleet, left Belle-Isle, where he arrived about the 20th of September, and entering the Channel, safely sailed by the Isle of Wight, without being attacked, and got into Diepe. He said that he had heard nothing of Ruyter. At last, being informed, who was killed by a cannon-ball. The English fleet, however, was not so easily overcome. The English fleet, under the command of the Duke of Beaufort, who, by accidents, real or pretended, arrived not at Belle-Isle till the end of September.

On the other hand, the King of Denmark without a junction of his fleet with that of the States, contented himself with guarding his own coasts. So, this year, as the last, the war by sea was carried on between England and the States only.

The King returning to London the 1st of February, proclaimed war against France [on the 10th.]

A few days before, the Queen miscarried, which entirely destroyed the common report that she was incapable of having children.

The command of the English fleet was given to Prince Rupert, the Duke of Albemarle (1). They remained till the 23d of April, but were not ready to sail till the end of May.

It consisted of seventy-eight ships of the line, besides frigates and fireships. In all appearance, the King was still then ignorant of the French King's secret intentions.

But he knew, the Duke of Beaufort had orders to repair to Belle-Isle with his fleet, said to consist of thirty-six sail, to join the Dutch fleet in the Channel.

1666. that the Dutch fleet was retired, he failed once more by the life of Wight, without meeting with any opposition, and got into the Ports of Bretagne. It is very surprising, that the English, who lay at the life of Wight to prevent the junction of the two enemies fleets, should suffer that of France to pass and repass without molestation (1). This may give occasion to suspect, there was some intelligence between France and England. But as I can't trace it, I sh^d. not insist upon it. But it plainly appears, the King of France, after having amused the Dutch a whole year on divers pretences, did not really declare against England till the 19th of January 1665-6, and still amused them all this year, with hopes of the arrival of the Duke of Beaufort, who entered the Channel but in September, when the Sea-campaign was over. If to this be added, Lewis's unwillingness to succour the States, as appears in his letter to d'Estades, there will be no cause to wonder at the little advantage received by the Dutch from the junction of France.

This year, the States had intended to assist the malecontents in England and Scotland, in order to give the English arms a diversion at home. This design was even communicated to the King of France. But he found so many objections to it, that it was suffered to fall unexecuted. Probably, the States had some correspondents among the Republicans, who being partly discovered, a great noise was made, and, according to custom, all the Non-conformists were charged with the plot.

The misfortune which this year befel the city of London, I mean the terrible fire which laid to great a part of that vast city in ashes, gave a fresh occasion to the enemies of the Republicans, to charge them with being the authors thereof. This was only because the fire, happened to break out the 3d of September (2), a day esteemed fortunate by the Republicans, on account of the victories of Dunbar and Worcester, obtained by Oliver Cromwell, when General of the armies of the Commonwealth of England. To represent without any aggravation, the ravages made by this fire in London, I need only insert the Inscription upon one of the sides of the column, erected on the place where the fire broke out. This column at London, is called the Monument, and visited by all strangers, but they only who understand the English language, can read this Inscription (3).

In the year of Christ 1666, the second day of September, at the distance of 202 Feet (the height of this Column) a terrible Fire broke out about midnight, which, driven on by a high wind, not only waisted the adjacent Parts, but also very remote Places, with incredible noise and fury. It consumed eighty-nine Churches, the City gates, Guild-halls, many publick Structures, Hospitals, Schools, Libraries, a vast number of stately Edifices, thirteen thousand two hundred dwelling Houses, four hundred Streets. Of the six and twenty Wards it utterly destroyed fifteen, and left eight others shattered and half burnt. The ruins of the City were four hundred thirty-six Acres, from the Tower by the Thames side, to the Temple Church, and from the North-East Gate, along the City-Wall to Holborn-bridge. To the Estates and Fortunes of the Citizens, it was merciless, but to their Lives very favorable, that it might in all things resemble the last Conflagration of the World. The destruction was sudden, for in a small space of time the same City was seen most flourishing, and reduced to nothing. Three days after, when this fatal Fire had baffled all human Counsels and Endeavours in the Opinion of all, it stopped, as it were, by a Command from Heaven, and was on every side extinguished.

Men failed not to give a scope to their imagination, and to form conjectures upon the causes and authors of this fire. The pious and religious ascribed it to the just vengeance of Heaven, on a city, where vice and immorality reigned so openly and shamefully, and which had not been sufficiently humbled by the raging Pestilence of the foregoing year. Some again, as I have said, ascribed this misfortune to the malice of the Republicans; others to the Papists. And there were some so bold, as even to suspect the King and the Duke of York. But, though several suspected persons were imprisoned, it was not possible to discover, or prove, that the Baker's house, where this dreadful calamity first broke out, was fired on purpose. However, [one Robert Hubert] a French Huguenot (4), native of Reims, and a lunatick, confessing himself guilty of this fact, was condemned and executed. But it appeared afterwards, by the testimony of the master of the ship, who brought him from France, that though he was landed at the time, he did not arrive in London till two days after the fire began. It is pretended likewise, that a Dutch boy, ten years of age, confessed, that his father, and himself, had thrown fire-balls into the Baker's house, through a window that stood open. But besides the objection which may be made to this testimony from the boy's age, there must have been some circumstance in his narrative, not agreeable to the fact, since it was not thought proper to make a farther enquiry. Perhaps this was only a groundless report.

But that which gives most cause to believe this fire not happen casually, is, the testimony of Dr. Lloyd, afterwards Bishop of Worcester. That Prelate told Dr. Burnet, E. 1666 from Burnet's History relating to this Fire p. 231. That one Grant a Papist had some time before appointed himself to Lloyd, who had great credit with the Countess of Clarendon, (who had a large estate in the new river that is brought from Ware to London) and said, he could raise that estate considerably, if she would make him a trustee for her. His schemes were probable, and he was made one of the board that governed that matter; and by that he had a right to come as oft as he pleased to view their works at Islington. He went thither the Saturday before the fire broke out, and called for the key of the place where the heads of the pipes were, and turned all the cocks that were then open, and stopped the water, and went away, and carried the keys with him. So when the fire broke out next morning, they opened the pipes in the streets to find water, but there was none. And some hours were lost in sending to Islington, where the door was to be broke open, and the cocks turned; and it was long before the water got to London. Grant indeed denied, that he had turned the cocks. But the officer of the works affirmed, that he had, according to order, set them all a running, and that no person had got the keys from him besides Grant; who confessed, he had carried away the keys, but pretended he did it without design.

This is Dr. Burnet's account, and agrees in the main with Echard's in his History of England. However, an anonymous Author who has writ against Doctor Burnet's History, accuses him directly of falsehood, and asserts that Grant was not one of the board till after the fire. But it is difficult to know what regard is due to the testimony of this illustrious Prelate, when he says, he had it from Doctor Lloyd, that Grant was made one of this board before the fire, and that it was by his means. However, this great fire was generally imputed to the Papists, and the more, because several other things afterwards helped to confirm this suspicion.

The Parliament meeting the 21st of September, the King in a Speech to both houses, told them, the money granted him had not sufficed to carry on the war, considering his two powerful enemies. He boasted of the great success with which God had been pleased to bless his arms, supposing his fleet to have been always victorious. Immediately after, the Commons liberally voted the King a supply of eighteen hundred thousand pounds. Thus in the space of two years, this war cost the People of England five millions, five hundred and fifty thousand pounds; that is, above sixty millions of Dutch florins, and above seventy-two millions of French livres, allowing thirteen Livres-Tournois to one pound Sterling.

Mean while, the two Houses beginning to discover, that the King was not the zealous Protestant he affected to appear; that the Papists had great influence in his Council, and that their Religion made a visible progress, presented to him an Address for executing the laws against Popish Priests and Jesuits, who were labouring to pervert his Subjects. The King according to the method of his Father, Grandfather, and his own, immediately published a Proclamation for banishing the Priests and Jesuits, on pain of being punish'd according to Law, if found in the Kingdom after the 10th of December. So banishment was the worst could happen to them, even supposing the King's order should have been executed. But the more rigorous the Proclamations were, the more favorable was the execution. This manifestly appears in their being so often repeated. But to give a more convincing proof of the Court's disposition in this respect, I shall here produce a passage in a Letter to the Earl of Sandwich, Ambassador at Madrid, from Secretary Bennet, lately created Earl of Arington, a reputed Papist, though he professed the Protestant Religion. In this letter he told the Ambassador, Your Excellency knows sufficiently the Springs upon which the animosity to the Roman-Catholics rises, and how hard it is for his Majesty to forbear declaring against them, when the complaint arises from both Houses of Parliament, and accordingly you can your self frame your answer to the Queen of Spain.

The rigor exercised against the Presbyterians in Scotland, An insurrection caused some of the most impatient to rise in arms to the number of fifteen hundred, and form a regular Body, with officers in proportion to head them. Probably, they hoped, if they should gain some advantage to be join'd by their Brethren. But in their first action with the King's forces, they were dispersed with the loss of three hundred men, and one hundred prisoners, who were most of them executed. It was not forgot to say that they held intelligence with the English Presbyterians, and, if they had gain'd the victory, the like insurrection would have appear'd in England. But it may easily be judg'd, that the Presbyterians in England would not have been spar'd, if they could have been proved guilty, considering how the Government stood affected towards them. Inconsiderable as this insurrection was, the English Historians have been pleas'd to represent it as very important, in saying, the nation was suddenly alarmed with an insurrection of the Presbyterians in Scotland, with whom it was not doubted those of England held a strict correspondence. These Authors are to be forgiven for not being willing to miss the first opportunity to include the English Presbyterians in these conspiracies, though it be only on the authority of a 'Tis believed.

The King was impatient for the dispatch of the Money-Bill, of which it seem'd the Commons took no farther notice. He therefore thought it necessary to quicken them by a message. He likewise told them, he could not permit any adjournment at Christmas, except for the principal Holidays. But this message it seems, produced no great effect. The Commons were then examining complaints against the Lord Mordant Governor of Windsor Castle, who was accus'd of some arbitrary and tyrannical actions. But neither this affair, nor the money-bill could be finish'd before the conclusion of the year.

The Parliament met the 2d of January, after a short adjournment, and immediately the Commons accus'd the Lord Mordant, at the bar of the Lords House, and then preferred articles of high crimes and misdemeanors against him. But they were displeas'd, that the accus'd was suffer'd to be within the bar of the House, whilst his accusation was reading. This occasion'd a dispute between the two Houses. There was also another difference between them, concerning the Commissioners appointed by the Commons to levy the Poll-tax, and to take the publick accounts on oath. This was the subject of several fruitless conferences (1).

The King came to the Parliament the 18th of January, and gave the royal assent to the Poll-bill, but complain'd of the nomination of Commissioners, as a mark of their distrust of him (2).

The misunderstanding between the two Houses still continuing, the King came to the Parliament the 8th of February, and after passing several Acts, he assur'd them, the money grant'd should be laid out for the ends it was given. Then he prorogued the Parliament to the 10th of October. The Acts pass'd were; an Act to continue for eleven months, the monthly assentment of seventy thousand pounds, which, with the Poll-tax, was conceiv'd sufficient to make good the eighteen hundred thousand pounds, grant'd to the King. The other Acts concern'd chiefly the new buildings in London, which were finish'd sooner than could be expected, and in a manner more beautiful and regular than before the fire (3).

It is now time to speak of the Peace between England and Holland, which was now, though very secretly, negotiating, at the time the Parliament granted eighteen hundred thousand pounds for carrying on the war. In November 1665, before the King of France had declar'd against England, the States, for a foundation of peace, had offer'd the King one of these two conditions, either that each of the parties should restore what had been taken, or both keep what they were possess'd of. This was a sure way to obviate all difficulties which might occur in the negotiation of peace. Besides, the last of these conditions was very advantageous to England, by reason of the great number of ships taken from the Dutch before even the war was proclaim'd. This offer was renew'd at Paris about the middle of the year 1666, in a conference there between Mr. de Lionne, the Lord Holles the English Ambassador, and Mr. Van Beuningen Envoy from the States. Probably, Charles expected greater advantages in the continuance of the war, since he return'd no answer to this offer. He only complain'd of its obscurity, without signifying where-in it consist'd. Nevertheless, he received this advantage from it, that he knew how the States were dispos'd, and what he could depend on: so that it was in his power to make peace whenever he should think proper. The 17th of September the same year the States repeated the same offer in a letter to the King. But as this was when the Parliament was going to sit, and when the King expected a large supply for carrying on the war, he did not think fit to embrace it. He contented himself with signifying to the States, in a letter of the 4th of October, his dissatisfaction at their proceedings, and at the calumnies they had rais'd against him, in accusing him of being the aggressor, and rejecting all proposals for peace. Then he largely justified himself upon what had been alledg'd by the States against him. But the most important part of this letter was, the King's positive assurance that he had accepted the mediation of Sweden. A place therefore to treat was to be agreed on. The choice of this place afford'd the King a pretence to defer the negotiation some months. He was at first for having the peace negotiated at London, to which the States would have readily consented, if the Kings of France and Denmark had believ'd it consistent with their honour. Upon the representation made by the States, concerning the refusal of the two Kings their allies, he answer'd, that he had no affair to negotiate with France, and complain'd of the King of Denmark for making war against him without any reason. He was so offended with that King, that he made no scruple to tell the States, it was at the instigation of Denmark, that he sent his fleet to Berghen, and agreed with him to divide the spoil. At last, the States left the nomination of the place to him, provided it was approv'd by their allies. The King accepted the offer, but insinuated that the States should first write to him, to testify that they would willingly have sent their Plenipotentiaries to London, if the two Kings their allies would have given their consent. This letter was writ, as he desired, the 13th of January 1666-7, and the King, in his answer of the 20th, nam'd the Hague for the place of conference. He knew, the Pensionary would not accept it, on account of the cabals which the English Ambassadors might make against him in favour of the young Prince of Orange. Accordingly De Wit privately caus'd the King of France to reject the proposal.

All the King's proceedings clearly show, he was desirous of peace, and, as it was in his power, he might have concluded it before the end of the year 1666. But too much haste would have deprived him of the eighteen hundred thousand pounds granted for the continuance of the war. This was the true reason of the difficulties rais'd by him concerning the place of congress, in order to gain time till the Money-Bill was pass'd. After he had given his assent to the last Bill for the continuation of the monthly assentment of seventy thousand pounds, all difficulties began to vanish. Seven or eight days after, the Earl of St. Albans was sent to Paris to notify to the King of France, that Charles consented that things should remain in the State to which the chance of war had reduced them. He added however one condition, namely, that France should restore to him the Isle of St. Christopher, and three other small Islands in America, seiz'd by that crown the last year. But this was a thing proper to be discuss'd at the Congress, whereas the choice of the alternative made the essence of the treaty with the States. So, it may be said, that from this time the peace was in a manner concluded; nothing being wanted but the formality of a treaty.

Mean while, the King of France, to serve Mr. De Wit, in preventing the King of England from insisting upon his nomination of the Hague, for the place of conference, thought of an expedient in which he succeeded. This was to name Dover for the place of Congress. And when it was objected to, he add'd Breda, Bris-le-duc, and Mosiericht, leaving to the King of England the choice of one of these four towns. At last, Charles having no longer interest to delay the Peace, writ to the States the 18th of March, that he was willing to send his Plenipotentiaries to Breda.

The Difficulty concerning the place of Congress being removed, the next thing was to appoint Ambassadors, and dispatch the pass-ports. And it was agreed the conferences for the peace should begin the 10th of May. But the English Plenipotentiaries arriv'd not at Breda till the 20th. These were the Lord Holles, and Mr. Henry Coventry (4). From France came Count d'Eftrades, and Mr. Courtin; from Denmark, Mess. Klingenberg and Canisius, and from the States General, Mess. Beurninck, Hubert and Tonghsl. The Mediators from the King of Sweden were, Mess. Flaming and Cent. But the last dying at Breda, during the conferences, Count de Dhuma, the Swedish Ambassador to the States, took his place.

At the first opening of the Congress, a very obvious mistake was discover'd, but which, in all appearance, had 1667.] been connived at by the two parties for fear of obstructing the Congress. In their letter to the King of England, the 17th of September, the States had made two proposals for peace, the second of which was that each should keep what he had taken, before or during the war. This was what the States had ever adhered to, without any variation. But the King in a letter to the States, the 24th of April 1667, said,—"We take this opportunity to declare to you, that we accept the choice proposed to us, that is, that each party shall keep whatsoever he has taken during this war, which being granted, we shall order our Ambassadors to proceed in the present treaty, upon the foundation of that made between us in the year 1662."

It is manifest, that in the second condition proposed by the States, was included whatever had been acquired by either party, not only during, but before, the war, and that in the King's letter was comprised only what had been taken during the war. Now the King, according to the terms of his acceptance, pretended, the States should make him satisfaction for the two ships, the Good Hope, and the Bon Adventure, taken, or sunk before the treaty of 1662. Moreover, he pretended, that as the States were obliged by the same treaty to restore to him the Isle of Polemon in the East-Indies, and as that Isle was still in their possession, it should be delivered to him. These two articles were the principal subject of the disputes in the conferences of Breda, and retarded the conclusion of the treaty, to the great damage of the English, as will hereafter appear. The States kept to the terms of their offer, and the King to those of his acceptance.

I have already spoken of the two ships taken by the Dutch in the interval between the two treaties of the year 1659, and 1662. As for the Isle of Polemon, the States pretended, they had restored it in form, and produced a receipt from the English officer, to whom it was delivered. But before this surrender, they had entirely despoiled it, and cut down all the Clove-trees, and in short, had seized it again since the beginning of this war. But the King pretended, there were essential defects in the form of the restitution, and that the States were obliged to restore it by the terms of the treaty 1662. The importance of this Isle consisted in that within four or five years it might be new stocked with Clove-trees, if it was in the hands of the English, and so prove very prejudicial to the Dutch, who were masters of the whole Spice-trade.

To decide these two articles, in which both parties made it a point of honour not to recede, Couriers were to be sent several times to London and the Hague, and those from London brought only stricter orders to the Ambassadors to insist upon the two ships, and the Isle of Polemon. But at length the King yielded the last, so that the whole Negotiation was reduced to the satisfaction demanded for the two ships. It is not very surprising, that the King should insist on this article. He had begun the war under the specious pretence of procuring reparation for all the damages done to his Subjects, which he computed at seven or eight hundred thousand pounds Sterling. To enable him to obtain this reparation by force of arms, the Parliament had furnished him with five hundred and fifty-five thousand pounds. He had moreover taken sixscore ships, before the war was declared, and above fourscore since. In all appearance, he had not applied the product of these captures to the benefit of his Subjects, who, according to his calculation, had lost seven or eight hundred thousand pounds, and for which the war was undertaken. He could not therefore well dispense with procuring the Merchants, who had lost these two ships, the satisfaction demanded by them, without giving occasion to believe, this war had been undertaken for imaginary pretensions. For the pretensions concerning these ships were properly the only things that were specified. All the rest consisted in generals, the discussion whereof was unnecessary, by reason of the choice proposed by the States. It was not that they feared a discussion, since they had offered it in the first of their two conditions. But it was the King's interest to avoid it, and accept the second condition. If he had embraced it, in the same terms as offered by the States, all the grounds of this war, so expensive to England, would have remained in obscurity. He could not therefore in honour but insist upon the only article, which could be considered as a just cause of the war, though it did not amount to ten thousand pounds Sterling. Mean while, as since the offer of the States, he saw, he could make peace when he pleased, he thought it a needless expence to put to sea a powerful fleet, as he had done the two foregoing years, and that it was better to save the best part of the money granted for the continuance of the war. To this end, relying on the certainty of a peace, he laid up his great ships, and kept only a squadron of twenty sail, while the States continued their preparations as usual, in their uncertainty of the King's intention concerning peace.

Mean time, the States seeing what difficulties the King formed upon an article of so little consequence, believed, or pretended to believe, he was averse to peace. They therefore resolved, either to force him to relinquish his pretensions, or at least to continue the war this summer with advantage, because they knew, that the King would have no fleet at sea.

Pursuant to this resolution, Ruyter sailed out of the Texel the 10th of June, with fifty ships, and came the 8th of June to the mouth of the Thames, from whence he detached Vice Admiral Van Ghent, with seventeen of his lightest ships, and some fire-ships.

Van Ghent, the 10th of June, sailed up the Medway, made himself master of the fort of Sheerness, and after burning a magazine full of stores, to the value of forty thousand pounds, blew up the fortifications. This action alarmed the city of London; so that to prevent greater mischiefs, several ships were sunk, and a large chain put across the narrowest part of the river Medway. But by means of an easterly wind, and a strong tide, the Dutch ships broke through the chain, and sailed between the sunk vessels. They immediately burnt three large ships, the Mathias, the Unity, and the Charles the Fifth, all taken from them in the present war, and carried away with them the hull of the Royal Charles, besides burning and damaging several others. After this, they advanced as far as Upnor castle, and burnt the Royal Oak, the Loyal London, and the Great James. The English fearing all the Dutch fleet would sail up to London bridge, sunk [thirteen] ships at Woolwich, and four at Blackwall, and Platforms furnished with artillery to defend them, were raised in several places. The consternation was very great, and the complaints were no less so. It was openly said, the King out of avarice had kept the money so generously given him to continue the war, and left his Ships and Subjects exposed to the insults of the enemy, though he had exclaimed against the injustice done him, in believing him capable of such an action. The King was under an inexpressible concern, as well for fear of greater damage from the Dutch fleet, as for the mortification this affair gave him, and the shame of having nothing to say to the murmurs of his people. Besides, he could not but reproach himself for being the cause of this insult, by insisting too long upon an affair of ten thousand pounds, and thereby retarding the conclusion of the peace (1).

After this exploit, Ruyter sailed to Portsmouth, with a design to burn the ships in that harbour; but finding them secured, he sailed to the West, and took some ships in Torbay. He then sailed Eastward, beat the English before Harwich, and chased a Squadron [of nineteen men of war] commanded by Sir Eduard Spragg, who was obliged to retire into the Thames. In a word, he kept the coasts of England in a continual alarm all July, till he received the news of the conclusion of a peace.

This event had so changed the face of affairs, that the English Ambassadors at Breda grew more pliant, and were easily persuaded to yield the article of the two Ships. It was however with the reservation of the King's approbation, before the signing of the treaty. For this purpose, Coventry, after all the articles were settled, passed into England the 2d of July, and returned the 8th with the King's approbation, and the 21st the treaty of peace was signed. It was divided however into three separate treaties, by reason of some inconveniences which would otherwise have followed. But by a writing signed by all the Plenipotentiaries, it was declared, that the three treaties should be esteemed but one and the same.

The most important articles of the treaty between England and France, were,

VII. The most Christian King shall restore to the King of Great-Britain, that part of the Isle of St. Christopher, which the French have taken from the English, since the declaration of war.

X. The King of Great-Britain shall restore to the most Christian King, the Country of Acadia, in North America, some time in possession of the said most Christian King.

XI. The most Christian King shall restore to the King of Great-Britain, the Isles of Antigua, and Montserrat, if they are still in his possession, and in general, all the Territories, Isles, Towns, and Fortresses, which may have been conquered by his Arms, and which belonged to the King of England before the beginning of the war with the States-General, and reciprocally the King of Great-Britain shall restore the Territories, Isles, Towns, &c.

XVII. This article contained a regulation of all the captures, which might be made since the conclusion of the peace.

XVIII. In case of a war, it is stipulated, that six months

Principal Articles of the Treaty between Great-Britain and the States-General.

Article III. Both sides shall forget and forgive all offences, damages, and losses, which either have suffered during this war, or at any time before, or under any pretence, as if they had never happened.—Each party shall hold for time to come in full right of sovereignty, propriety and possession, all such countries, cities, towns, forts, places and colonies, as, whether during this war, or before, have been taken and kept from the other by force of arms, and in what other manner soever, and that as they possessed and enjoyed them the 10th day of May last.

IV. All ships, goods and moveables, which at any time have come into the power of either party, shall remain in the present possessors thereof, without any compensation or restitution for the same.

V. All actions, demands, and pretensions whatsoever for the same shall remain void, obliterated, and disannulled, &c.

XV. The said Lord the King, and the said Lords the States, shall not receive into their Dominions any such persons as shall be declared fugitive rebels, of the one or the other.

XIX. All ships and vessels of the United-Provinces, as well men of war as merchant-ships, and others, which shall meet in the Britannick Seas any ships of war belonging to the King of Great-Britain, shall strike the flag, and lower the sail as it has formerly been practiced.

XXXII. If the former differences shall be renewed, and turned into an open war, the ships, merchandize, and all moveable effects of both parties, which shall be found in the Sea-ports and Dominions of the adverse party, shall be by no means confiscated or damaged; but there shall be granted to the Subjects of both parties the term of six whole months, during which time they may transport the said effects where they please.

XXXVI. For the greater assurance that the present treaty shall be observed with good faith on the part of the States-General, they engage themselves by these Presents, that those persons who shall be chosen by the said States-General, or the particular Provinces, into the offices of Captain-General, Stadtholder, Field Marshal, Admiral, shall swear that they will observe, and cause to be observed religiously this treaty.

By a separate article it was agreed, That if any of the Murderers of Charles I. should be found in the Dominions of the States-General, they should be delivered to the King, &c.

Reflections upon this Treaty.

If it is now considered, what advantages England received from a war undertaken upon so slight grounds, and with such animosity, it will not be easy to discover a single advantage that was not really contained in the treaty of the 4th of September 1662. But on the contrary, it will be found, that this war cost five millions five hundred and fifty thousand pounds Sterling, besides the loss of the ships of war, whether in sea-engagements, or in the affair of Chatham (1). And yet the King had assured the Parliament, in one of his speeches, that he would never lay down his arms, till he had procured his Subjects a reasonable satisfaction for their losses, which upon his computation, amounted to seven or eight hundred thousand pounds. And if these losses are supposed real, this peace was so much the more dishonorable to the King and the English Nation. But, on the other hand, it is easy to perceive, that the King and Duke of York reaped by it considerable advantages: the King, by the large supplies of money which were granted him, but not expended in the war, at least, the eighteen hundred thousand pounds given in January and February this year, and by the sale of above two hundred ships taken from the Dutch: the Duke of York, by his claims upon these captures as Lord High-Admiral, and by the present of one hundred and twenty thousand pounds made him by the Parliament. Such was the conclusion of this great armament, which was to humble the pride of the Dutch, and render them for ever incapable to support their trade and dispute the Empire of the Seas with England. The peace was proclaimed at London, and at the Hague, the 24th of August.

Edward.

The King of France invades the Netherlands. Kennet. p. 292. Brinsage R. Coke.

The King of France, as hath been seen, gave no very real assistance to his allies, since his fleet never joined that of the States, nor even this last year, when the English were in no condition to oppose the junction. He had then other designs, which he discovered in June, by an invasion of the Netherlands, on account of his Queen's pretensions to Brabant, after the death of Philip IV. her Father. In the whole course of the war between the King of England and the States-General, he clearly showed his intention to make Charles his friend, in which he afterwards succeeded but too well. He would never have declared against him, notwithstanding his strict engagement with the States in the treaty of 1662, had he not believed such a Declaration absolutely necessary to support Mr. De Witt, who otherwise was in great danger of ruin. He earnestly wished to see the end of this war, in which he had very unwillingly engaged. This appeared chiefly in the conferences at Breda, where his two Plenipotentiaries performed properly the office of Mediators, though those of Sweden had the name. Accordingly he was greatly suspected in Holland of a secret correspondence with England.

Complaints and murmurs against King Charles and his Ministers succeeded the animosity with which the Dutch war was begun. When the advantages obtained by the peace were compared with the expence of the war, they were found so disproportionable, that men could not forbear suspecting, it had been raised by motives repugnant to the interest of England. The people had been told, it was undertaken to procure the Merchants satisfaction for the damages received from the Dutch: to revenge the indignities the Nation had suffered: and to incapacitate the United Provinces ever to rival England again; but nothing of all this had been done. The Merchants had received no satisfaction even for the two ships, the Good-Hope and the Bon-Adventure, though that article was the most specified. Instead of revenging the affronts offered the Nation, England had received a real and most mortifying indignity in the business of Chatham. Lastly, after the peace of Breda, the United-Provinces were in a more flourishing condition than before the war, and looked on this peace as a triumph for them. On the other hand, few people could digest the King's pressing the Parliament for money to carry on the war, and that after receiving eighteen hundred thousand pounds Sterling he should be so intent upon peace, as not to put himself in a condition to obtain reasonable terms. This was a subject very apt to raise a suspicion of the sincerity of his intentions for the good of his people. In short, it was more and more discovered that the Papists had great influence at Court, and that the Proclamations published against them at the desire of the Parliament, were far from being rigorously executed. The Earl of Arlington, almost open protector of the Papists, was made Secretary of State, and in great favour, while the credit of the Earl of Clarendon, their enemy, daily declined. This began to produce suspicions disadvantageous to the King. Besides, his dissolute life did not help to preserve the high opinion conceived of him in the beginning of his reign. His Court was a scene of debauchery, where his mistresses ruled absolutely, and nothing was done but through their means. They consumed his vast revenues, with almost all the money granted by Parliament, so that in the midst of riches, he was always in want, and forced to seek new pretences to draw money from his Parliament, to supply his private occasions.

These suspicions and complaints reaching the King, he resolved to appease them by sacrificing the Earl of Clarendon, who had hitherto acted as Prime-Minister. He knew, the People are always excessively pleased with sacrifices of Ministers, who have enjoyed the greatest credit, and to whom generally all the miscarriages are thrown. But this was only a pretence used by the King to be delivered of a Minister, whom he no longer loved, and whose presence and counsels were become insupportable to him. The Chancellor's regular life, his aversion to debauchery and libertinism, his grave and severe manners, his neglect of the King's favourites and mistresses, and lastly, his principles and maxims concerning religion and the state, ill agreed with the disorderly life of the court, and still less with the projects formed in favour of the Papists, under colour of easing the Presbyterians. For this reason, and for his rough and always too haughty behaviour, he had rendered himself odious to all the courtiers, who never ceased to do him ill offices, especially when they saw him in the decline of his favour. He had often taken the liberty to reprove the King for his disorderly life, and at first his reproofs were well received. But when the King had once abandoned himself to his pleasures, he could no longer bear the presence of a man, whose advice he had formerly received with a sort of submission. The Duke of Backingham and some others perceiving this disposition of the King, neglected nothing to cherish it. As often as they saw the Chancellor coming, they would say to his Majesty, Here comes your School-master! At other times they mimicked him before the King, in order to make him ridiculous. The

(1) The Dutch were also, on their part, put to very great charges. For St. William Temple affirms, That in the year 1665, there were raised in the Provinces forty millions of Gulden, of which twenty two in the Province of Holland. And upon the 8th of November the invading them at the same time by Land, they had, in the year 1666, above threecore thousand Land men pay'd; and a Fleet of above an hundred Men of War at Sea. Observe upon the United-Provinces, p. 71.

1667. Duke of Buckingham used to walk in a stately manner, with a pair of bellows before him for the Purse, whilst Colonel Titus carried a fire-shovel on his shoulder for the mace. The King suffered these buffooneries, and thereby discovered his disgust to his minister. But as these are only trifles, and as the King's disgust turned at last into real hatred, it is proper to relate the more serious causes which have been offered in vindication of the King's resentment.

1. It is pretended, the King desiring to be divorced from his Queen on several weak pretences, could never obtain the Chancellor's approbation.

2. The King intended, after his divorce, to marry Mrs. Stewart his relation, of whom he was amorous. The Earl of Clarendon, to prevent this, persuaded the young Duke of Richmond to marry her, by representing, how serviceable it would be to gain him the King's favour. The Duke, following this advice, made his addresses to the Lady, who, knowing nothing of the King's design, believed the ought not to refuse so good an offer, and the marriage was immediately concluded. The King thus disappointed, banished the Duke, with his new Duchess, from the Court, and never forgave the Chancellor.

3. Another, and, as was generally thought, the most apparent cause of the King's resentment against the Chancellor, was his opposing Popham's project of settling an annual revenue of two millions of pounds Sterling upon the King, which was seconded by the Earl of Southampton.

4. The most probable cause of the Chancellor's ruin was, that the Papists, whose counsels and projects were listened to, and approved by the King, omitted nothing to destroy him, knowing, that under his Ministry they could never hope to accomplish their designs.

5. A stately House built by him near St. James's Park (1), and in the very year of the Plague did him great injury in the minds of the people. It is pretended, it cost him fifty thousand pounds Sterling, though at first he designed to lay out but fifteen or sixteen thousand. People gave it the name of Dunkirk-House, because it was supposed that his advice for the sale of that place had furnished him with the means to build it. He committed another error, in purchasing for this House the stones designed for repairing St. Paul's.

However this be, the King, under colour of giving some satisfaction to his People in sacrificing this Minister, deprived him of his office of High-Chancellor, and made Sir Orlando Bridgeman Lord-Keeper of the Great-Seal.

The Earl of Southampton Lord Treasurer, dying three months before the Chancellor's disgrace, the King was at once deprived of two great and faithful Ministers, whose loss was never repaired, at least, with regard to their morals, their religion, and affection for their country. A little before Southampton's death, some person in council speaking against the Chancellor, he with some emotion said — The Earl of Clarendon is a true Protestant, and an honest Englishman, and while he is in place we are secure of our laws, liberties, and religion: but whenever he shall be removed, England will feel the ill effects of it. In this he proved a true Prophet.

After the Earl of Southampton's death, the King put the Treasury into commission. Among the Commissioners was Sir Thomas Clifford a known Papist (2), on whom afterwards fell the King's choice for Lord Treasurer.

The Lord-Keeper's Speech to the House.
Echard.
Kennet.

The Parliament meeting the 10th of October, the King spoke but little, and left it to the Lord-Keeper, to acquaint both Houses with his Intentions. His Speech ran chiefly upon a sort of excuse for the King's having, contrary to custom, after a prorogation to October, ordered the Parliament by Proclamation to meet the 25th of July, and then, by another Proclamation deferred the new session to the time first appointed. He communicated to them the conclusion of the peace, and desired them to settle the balance of trade with Scotland. He said, the King having named Commissioners to state the public accounts, and examine to what uses the money granted by Parliament had been applied, and this commission not having succeeded as he expected, he left them to follow their own method, and examine them as strictly as they pleased. He added, that some malicious persons had dispersed false reports against the Government, with design to create a dissension in his subjects: but that his Majesty promised himself from their affection, they would, on the contrary, endeavour to preserve a good understanding between him and his people. That if any just grievances have happened, his Majesty was ready to redress them, and did not doubt they would imprint upon the hearts of his subjects that known truth — That there is no distinct interest between the King and his People, but the good of one is the good of both.

Some days after, the two Houses presented an address to the King to thank him for several things: 1. That he had disbanded the late raised forces: 2. That he had dismissed the Papists from out of his guards, and other military employments: 3. That he had revoked the Canary patent: 4. And more especially, That he had displaced the late Lord Chancellor, and removed him from the exercise of publick trust and employment in affairs of State. The King answered to this last article, That he would never employ the Earl of Clarendon again in any publick affairs whatsoever.

The King sufficiently discovering his intention not to protect the Earl of Clarendon, the House was thereby encouraged to seek reasons or pretences to impeach him of Treason. But it is too little to say, the King would not protect him. It is certain, he himself was his adversary, and actuated the Commons against him. This he clearly showed, by reprimanding Sir Stephen Fox who was of his Household, and Member of the House of Commons, for having voted in favour of the Earl of Clarendon. To Echard, which Sir Stephen replied, That he knew the Earl to be an honest Man, and was sure could never be guilty of the crimes laid to his charge. At last, the Commons proceeding with great passion, ordered an accusation to be drawn and presented to the House, the substance whereof is as follows.

“ I. That the Earl of Clarendon hath designed a standing army to be raised, and to govern the Kingdom thereby; and advised the King to dissolve this present Parliament, and to lay aside all thoughts of Parliaments for the future; to govern by a military Power, and to maintain the same by free quarter and contribution.

“ II. That he hath, in the hearing of the King's subjects, falsely and seditiously said, That the King was in his heart a Papist, or Popishly affected, or words to that effect.

“ III. That he hath received great sums of money for the procuring of the Canary-Patent, and other illegal Patents; and granted illegal Injunctions to stop proceedings at law against them, and other illegal Patents formerly granted.

“ IV. That he hath advised and procured divers of his Majesty's subjects to be imprisoned against law, in remote Islands, Garrisons, and other places, thereby to prevent them from the benefit of the law, and to produce Precedents for the imprisoning any other of his Majesty's subjects in like manner.

“ V. That he procured his Majesty's customs to be farmed at under rates knowing the same; and great pretended debts to be paid by his Majesty, to the payment of which his Majesty was not strictly bound, and afterwards received great sums of money for procuring the same.

“ VI. That he received great sums of money from the Company of Vintners, or some of them or their agents, for enhancing the Prices of Wines, and for freeing them from the payment of legal Penalties, which they had incurred.

“ VII. That he had in a short time gained to himself a greater estate than can be imagined to be gained lawfully in so short a space: and, contrary to his oath, he hath procured several grants under the seal, from his Majesty to himself and relations, of several of his Majesty's Lands, Hereditaments and Leases, to the disprofit of his Majesty.

“ VIII. That he hath introduced an arbitrary Government in his Majesty's foreign Plantations, and hath caused such as complained thereof before his Majesty and Council, to be long imprisoned for so doing.

“ IX. That he did reject and frustrate a proposal and undertaking approved by his Majesty, for the preservation of Neuvis and St. Christopher's, and reducing the French Plantations to his Majesty's obedience, after the Commissions were drawn for that purpose; which was the occasion of our great losses and damages in those parts.

“ X. That he held correspondence with Cromwell and his accomplices, when he was in parts beyond the seas, attending his Majesty, and thereby adhered to the King's enemies.

“ XI. That he advised and effected the sale of Dunkirk to the French Kings, being part of his Majesty's Dominions; together with the ammunition, artillery, and

It was built in his absence, in 1665, chiefly at the charge of the Vintners Company, who designing to monopolize his favour, made it more large and magnificent than ever he intended. So that when he came to see it, he said with a sigh, “ This House will one day be my ruin.” Echard, Tom. 3. p. 192.

1667. "that they might be ready for the war, his Majesty used
"all possible means to prepare and dispose the Spaniard
"with that apprehension, offering his friendship to that "degree, as might be for the benefit and security of both "Crowns.

"But Spain flattering itself, that France would not "break with them, at least, that they would not give "them any cause by admitting matter of jealousy to "them, never made any real approach towards a friend"ship with his Majesty, but, both by their Ambassadors
"here, and to his Majesty's Ambassador at Madrid, always "perflited, as Preliminaries, upon the giving up of Dunkirk, "Tangier, and Jamaica.

"Though France had an Ambassador here, to whom a "project of a treaty was offered, and the Lord Holles, his "Majesty's Ambassador at Paris, used all endeavours to "pursue and prosecute the said treaty, yet it was quickly
"discerned, that the principal design of France, was to "draw his Majesty into such a nearer alliance as might "advance their design; without which, they had no mind
"to enter into the treaty proposed.

"And this was the state of affairs when the war was "entered into with the Dutch, from which time, neither "Crown much considered the making any alliance with "England.

"As I did from my soul abhor the entering into this "war, so I presumed never to give any advice or counsel "for the way of managing it, but by opposing many pro"positions, which seemed to the late Lord Treasurer and "myself to be unreasonable, as the payment of the sea"men by tickets, and many other particulars which added "to the expence.

"My enemies took all occasions to inveigh against me,
"and making their friendship with others out of the coun"cil, of more licentious principles, and who knew well "enough how much I disliked and complained of the liber"ty they took to themselves of reviling all Councils and "Counsellors, and turning all things serious and sacred in"to ridicule. They took all ways imaginable to render "me ungrateful to all sorts of men, (whom I shall be "compelled to name in my defence) persuading those that
"mis-carried in any of their designs, that it was the "Chancellor's doing; whereof I never knew any thing.
"However, they could not withdraw the King's favour "from me, who was still pleased to use my service with "others, nor was there ever any thing done but with the "joint advice of at least the major part of those who were "consulted with. And as his Majesty commanded my "service in the late treaties, so I never gave the least ad"vice in private, nor wrote one letter to any one person
"in either of those negotiations but upon the advice of the "council, and also after it was read in council, or at "least, by the King himself, and some others; and if I "prepared any instructions or memorials, it was by the "King's command, and the request of the Secretaries who "desired my assistance; nor was it any with of my own,
"that any Ambassador should give me any account of "the transactions, but to the Secretaries, to whom I was "always ready to advise; nor am I conscious to my self
"of ever having given advice that hath proved mischievous
"or inconvenient to his Majesty; and I have been so far "from being the sole manager of affairs, that I have not,
"in the whole last year, been above twice with his Ma"jesty in any room alone, and very seldom in the two or "three years preceding.

"And since the Parliament at Oxford, it hath been very "visible, that my credit hath been very little, and that "very few things have been hearkened to, which have "been proposed by me, but contradicted, eo nomine, be"cause proposed by me.

"I most humbly beseech your Lordships to remember
"the office and trust I had for seven years, in which, in "discharge of my duty, I was obliged to stop and obstruct "many mens pretences, and refused to set the seal to many "pardons and other grants, which would have been pro"fitable to those who procured them, and many where-
"of, upon my representation to his Majesty, were for "ever stoppt, which naturally have raised many enemies
"to me: And my frequent concurring, upon the desires "of the late Lord Treasurer, (with whom I had the "honour to have a long and vast friendship to his death)
"in representing several excesses and exorbitances, the "yearly issue so far exceeding the revenues, provoked
"many persons concerned, of great power and credit, to "do me all the ill offices they could. And yet I may faith"fully say, that I never meddled with any part of the "revenue or the administration of it, but when I was de"sired by the late Lord Treasurer to give him my af"fiance and advice, having had the honour formerly "to serve the Crown as Chancellor of the Exchequer,

"which was for the most part in his Majesty's preference.
"Nor have I ever been in the least degree concerned,
"in point of profit, in letting any part of his Majesty's "revenue; nor have ever treated or debated it, but in his "Majesty's preference, in which my opinion concurred al-
"way with the major part of the Counsellors who were "present.

"All which, upon examination, will be made manifest
"to your Lordships, how much soever my integrity is "blasted by the malice of those who, I am confident, do "not believe themselves. Nor have I in my life, upon "all the treaties, or otherwise, received the value of one "shilling from all the Kings or Princes in the world, (ex"cepting the books of the Louvre print sent me by the "Chancellor of France, by that King's direction) but
"from my own master, to whose intire service, and the "good and welfare of my country, no man's heart was "ever more devoted.

"This being my present condition, I do most hum"bly beseech your Lordships to entertain a favourable "opinion of me, and to believe me to be innocent from "those foul aspersions, until the contrary shall be proved;
"which I am sure can never be by any man worthy to "be believed: And since the distempers of the times, and "the difference between the two Houses in the present
"debate, with the power and malice of my enemies, "who gave out that I should prevail with his Majesty to "prorogue or dissolve this Parliament in displeasure, and "threaten to expose me to the rage and fury of the peo"ple, may make me to be looked upon as the cause which "obstructs the King's service, and unity and peace of the "Kingdom.

"I most humbly beseech your Lordships, that I may "not forfeit your Lordships favour and protection, by "withdrawing my self from so powerful a persecution, in "hope that I may be able, by such withdrawing, here"after to appear and make my defence, when his Ma"jesty's Justice (to which I shall always submit) may not "be obstructed, or controlled, by the power and malice
"of those who have sworn my destruction."

cember, desired a conference with the Commons, to communicate it to them. The Duke of Buckingham, who was to deliver it said, The Lords have commanded me to de- liver you this scandalous and seditious Paper, sent from the Earl of Clarendon: They bid me to present it to you, and desire you in convenient time to send it to them again, for it has a style which they are in love with, and therefore desire to keep it.

The reading of this Apology threw the Commons into a republick flame. Some of the Earl's enemies (1) took occasion to make the most virulent speeches against him, and at last, the House voted his Apology scandalous and malicious, and a reproach to the justice of the nation, and ordered it to be burnt by the common hangman.

The 13th of December, the Lords sent to the Commons a Bill for the banishment of the Earl of Clarendon, which met with great opposition in that House. Some of the members even proposed a Bill of Attainder against him.
At last, the House voted, That the King should be prayed to issue out his Proclamation for summoning the said Earl to appear by a day, and to apprehend him in order to his trial, and that the Lords be sent to for their concurrence in this vote. But the Lords refused their concurrence, because this vote was contrary to their Bill.

lingly gave his assent. The truth is, it was the King who had employed the Duke of York, to prevail with the Earl of Clarendon to withdraw, or he was not desirous of having at last softened the King, or he was not desirous of having the articles of impeachment discussed, which might have discovered things he had rather conceal.

Thus was the Earl of Clarendon sacrificed to the malice Reflections be said, their persecution did him more honour, than the crimes, which for the most part were groundless, could do him injury. These enemies were, first, the King himself, who on this occasion forgot all the services this faithful Minister had done his father and himself, at a time when his affection and fidelity could not be suspected, since there was no appearance of his being ever rewarded. What is more strange, the King came to hate him, merely because he served him too well, and, in a just concern for his glory, did what lay in his power to prevent his falling into contempt, and engaging in projects which could not but render him unfortunate. His other enemies were, the King's mistresses and favorites, persons of profligate lives, of no Religion, or of one contrary to that of the Establishment, who hated him only because they thought him too honest, 1667, or believed him incapable of being gained to assist their designs. For it is generally allowed, that not a single article of his accusation, except that of the sale of Dunkirk, could be proved.

If the Presbyterians had procured the Lord Clarendon's ruin, there had been nothing strange in it, since he was their professed enemy. For it may be affirmed, that from him came all their misfortunes, since the beginning of this reign. But the Presbyterians had then no credit, no access, either to Court or Parliament. What is most surprizing in the downfall of this Minister, is the animosity wherewith he was pursued by the same House of Commons, wunch he himself had, if I may so say, composed of men of the most extravagant principles, with respect to Religion and Government. But he found himself mistaken in his views. For these same principles, with regard to the royal power, so firmly attached the House to the King, that they made no scruple to abandon the Earl of Clarendon, though head of the party, when once the King expressed his displeasure against him. This is not the only instance of the ablest Politicians labouring their own ruin, by seemingly the best contrived projects.

Amongst the great services rendered by the Earl of Clarendon to Charles I. and Charles II., his excellent History of the Rebellion and Civil Wars in England, ought to be remembered, which was not published till after his death. In this history are undeniable proofs of the Author's sincere attachment to Charles I. Nay, very likely, it was writ with the sole design to justify the conduct of that unfortunate Prince, and place it in the best light, it is capable of. If any thing can injure this History, it is, that the views of the Author are too undisguised. This gives impartial Readers occasion to think, it was not writ so much for the instruction of the publick in the truth of facts, as to prepossess them, by various artifices, and numberless insinuations, in favour of a system, which all Readers, versed in the History and Government of England, will, doubtless, not admit. Another charge against this Author, is, the contempt and animosity which he every where shows against the Presbyterians, and the Scots, even in places where it seems foreign to his purpose. But this came from his heart. His immoderate passion against Presbyterianism, was this great man's foible. He gloried in his hatred of the Presbyterians, and perhaps contributed more than any other, to that excess of animosity which still subsists among the followers of his maxims and principles.

From a private Gentleman, and a Lawyer, the Earl of Clarendon rose to the highest degree of fortune, that a man of his rank could aspire to. For by his merit, and his inviolable attachment to Charles I. and Charles II., he was raised to the dignity of Earl, of Lord High-Chancellor, and of Prime Minister of State. But what gives a farther lustre to his glory, is, that from the marriage of his daughter with the Duke of York, sprung two Princesses successively Queens of England. He spent the rest of his days in banishment, amidst Protestant Presbyterians, and Papists, whose declared enemy he had been, during the time of his favour, but who failed not to pay him all the respect due to his merit, and the dignities with which he had been honoured in his own Country. He died at Roan the latter end of December 1674, aged sixty-seven.

The day after the Act for the Earl of Clarendon's banishment passed in the House of Commons, the King gave his assent to it by commission. Then, he sent a message to the Commons, by Secretary Morrice, to wish them to adjourn to the 6th of February. In the Reign of James I. there was a difference between the King and Commons, concerning the right of adjournment. The Commons pretended, that though the King had power to dissolve or prorogue a Parliament, he could not adjourn it, and that Adjournment entirely belonged to each House. But the Lords refusing their concurrence, the Commons were obliged to drop their pretension. From that time James I. and Charles I. always supposed this right as undeniable, and yet the point had never been decided in form. It seems therefore, that Charles II., by desiring the Parliament to adjourn, was willing to show some regard to the pretensions of the Commons, or at least, to avoid all occasion of dispute with them. But this condescension lasted not long; for it will hereafter appear, that he frequently adjourned the Parliament by his own authority, without any dislike expressed by the Commons. Now the difference between an Adjournment and a Prorogation consists in this, that a prorogation ends the sessions, and annuls all affairs which have been proposed or debated in Parliament without being finished, so that they cannot serve for ground to the resolutions of a new session, unless they are proposed afresh. But an adjournment only suspends them till the Parliament re-assembles. For this reason, when the Commons have voted the King a supply, the Parliament is seldom or never prorogued, but only adjourned when some short recess is necessary, that at their meeting again, they may proceed upon the vote till it be passed into an Act.

Before the Parliament met in October, the King published a Proclamation, for the rigorous execution of the laws against those who repaired to hear Mass at the chapels of Ambassadors. He still persisted in his diffimulation with regard to Religion, and in his design to persuade his Subjects, that he was a good Protestant. It was properly for this that these Proclamations were intended. But the non-performance of them had a quite contrary effect. For it could not be thought necessary so frequently to repeat them, if the King had been pleased with seeing them executed according to law.

This same month of October, the King rode in the state into the City, and laid the first stone of the foundation of the Royal Exchange. The Building was finished in a very short time.

This year, death, as I have said, took out of the world Thomas Wriothley Earl of Southampton, Lord Treasurer. The other less remarkable deaths were those of Dr. Matthew Wren Bishop of Ely, (great enemy of the Presbyterians, who, out of revenge for his severity to them before the civil wars, kept him prisoner in the Tower from the year 1642 till the Restoration, when he was restored to his Bishoprick of Ely, where he died aged eighty one years.) And of the famous Poet Abraham Cowley, little known to strangers, but very much, and deservedly, esteemed by the English.

After the removal of the Earl of Clarendon, the King and his Ministers, of whom the Earl of Arington, and Sir Orlando Bridgeman were the principal, believed it absolutely necessary to give the people some satisfaction, by demonstrating the Court's attention to the welfare of the nation. The King of France, by his invasion of Flanders, had so clearly shown, he did not intend to stand to his Queen's renunciation of all the members of the Spanish Monarchy, that he could not possibly be mistaken. Besides, his power was daily increasing, whereas that of Spain was visibly declining. It was therefore the interest of Europe in general, and of England in particular, to take early and effectual measures, to set bounds to this formidable power, which might produce great changes, if care was not taken to stop its progress. Nothing was more popular than such a design, and nothing more capable to re-ingratiate the King with his Subjects. So, the 1st of January 1667-8, a resolution was taken, to enter into a strict union with the King of Sweden, to prevent the Kings of France and Spain, and the Emperor of Mexico, from attacking Sweden, and the King of Sweden resolved, to endeavour to engage the King of Sweden into the same measures, and to form a Triple alliance, capable to intimidate Lewis XIV. and oblige him to proceed with more caution.

To execute this project, Sir William Temple was ordered to the Hague, with the character of envoy extraordinary and plenipotentiary. I shall not defend into the particulars of this negotiation, which are related in the writings of Sir William Temple, published in a French version. I shall only observe, that by the address of this Envoy, the treaty of alliance between the King and the States was concluded in five days, and, what is more, signed by the States-General, without communicating it to the particular Provinces, which had never been practised before. Moreover, the Count de Dhana, Ambassador of Sweden, engaged for his master that he should enter into this treaty, if a place was left for him as a principal. Afterwards, this Count signed a like treaty in the name of the King of Sweden with the King of England and the States General, it being agreed, that this treaty should be considered as part of the former when ratified. These treaties were first sent into England, and ratified by the King, and, shortly after, the King of Sweden's ratification was likewise received. Thus was concluded, in a very little time, a triple League, the most important that had been long since made in Europe, and which was to check the power, as well as vast designs of France.

For the understanding this treaty, of which I shall presently give the substance, it must be observed, that Lewis XIV. after his last campaign, during which he had taken many strong places of the Spanish Netherlands (1), had, at p. 135, the pressing instances of the States-General, consented to a treaty with Spain, till the end of March 1668. Moreover, he had left to the Queen-Regent of Spain, the choice of either yielding to him the places conquered by him in the last campaign, or else the Duchy of Luxembourg, or, instead of it, Franche-Comté, Cambray and Caudebec, Duoy, Aire, St. Omer, Bergues, Furnes, and Linck, for which he promised to surrender all the rest of his conquests. These offers, as it appears, were founded upon the suppo-

A triple League. The King of Sweden resolved, to endeavour to engage the King of Sweden into the same measures, and to form a Triple alliance, capable to intimidate Lewis XIV. and oblige him to proceed with more caution.

fiction, that the French Queen's renunciation, in the treaty of her marriage, was of no force. Though the thing had been decided only by the King of France himself, the States-General, seeing no possibility of obliging him to desist from his pretensions, had approved of this alternative, and positively engaged to join their forces with those of France, to compel Spain to embrace one or other of these offers. They could not therefore recede, after such an engagement. For which reason, they resolved to make with England three different treaties, which, however, were to take place, as containing but one and the same treaty.

The first treaty contained a defensive alliance between England and the States-General, against all who should attack either of the parties, with a specification of the succours to be mutually given, in case of such an attack. This alliance to be perpetual.

By the second treaty, the King and the States were obliged to use their joint endeavours to dispose the King of France to make peace in the Netherlands, upon one of the proposed conditions, and likewise the King of Spain to make choice of one of the two before the end of May. But, in case of any difficulty from the Spaniard, they engaged to use their endeavours to induce the King of France to stop all farther progress of his arms in Flanders, and leave it wholly to the allies, to procure the ends proposed in the League.

The third treaty contained, 1. That if in procuring peace between France and Spain, any difficulties should arise concerning the renunciation, care should be taken so to settle the articles of peace, as to create no prejudice to the rights of either. But if one side only should reject this expedient, then the allies should proceed against the refuser, in the manner agreed in the second treaty. 2. That the allies should use their endeavours to establish peace between Spain and Portugal. And though they did not pretend to hinder the King of France from assisting Portugal, they would however prevent, as far as lay in their power, his assisting that nation by making war in the Netherlands. 3. But, in case the King of France rejecting the conditions contained in the second treaty, should make farther progress in Flanders, then the allies should join with Spain, and make war upon the King of France, till they should compel him to comply with the terms of the Pyrenean treaty. 4. That all these articles should be ratified within four weeks (1).

This treaty which, as I said, was signed by the King of Sweden as a principal, and was called the Triple-League, received the applauses of all Europe, except France. Indeed, the tendency of it was not only to save the Netherlands, pursuant to the true interests of England and the States-General, but also to prevent a fatal war, which must have thrown all Europe into a flame. It is perhaps the only step taken by Charles, through the whole course of his reign, really tending to the advantage of England. It will hereafter appear, that, probably, he had no other intention than to dazzle the publick, and amuse the world, by a proceeding so much to his honour. But in ill supporting what he had so happily begun, he manifestly showed, that he erred not through ignorance, or want of knowing the interests of his Kingdom, and those of all Europe.

Shortly after, Sir William Temple concluded a treaty of commerce with the States-General, and about the same time the treaty of peace between Spain and Portugal was happily finished, under the guaranty of the King of England.

While these affairs were transacting, the Parliament met the 10th of February. The King, in his speech to both Houses, informed them, that he had made a league defensive with the States of the United Provinces, and another for an efficacious mediation of peace between France and Spain, into which the King of Sweden had, by his Ambassador, offered to enter as a principal. He added, that the posture of his neighbours, and the consequence of the new alliance, obliging him to set out a fleet to sea, he should want a speedy supply; that besides it was necessary to build some large ships, and fortify the ports. He concluded with desiring them to think seriously of some course, to beget a better union and composure in the minds of his subjects in matters of religion.

The Commons joyfully received the news of the triple-alliance; but before they proceeded to the consideration of the King's Speech, they resolved to inquire into the mismanagements during the late war. They appointed for this purpose a Committee, which discovered many misdemeanours in the conduct of several persons, "as in the affair of Bergen in Norway; in the plundering the East-India ships while the Dutch passed by; in the not fetting out a sufficient fleet last year; in the separation of those that were out, so that they became useless; in the want of provision and ammunition in the fleet, and in the forts; in payment of the sea-men by tickets; in the want of intelligence and dividing the fleets in the second year of the war; in the business of Chatham, &c." The Commons accused Brouncker, that, after the first battle, he had carried false orders from the Duke of York, while that Prince was reposing himself, which had prevented the entire destruction of the enemy's fleet, and expelling him the House ordered him to be impeached. As to the affair of Chatham, they accused Commissioner Pett for having neglected his duty. Sir William Penn was accused of having embezzled great quantities of rich goods taken in a Dutch prize (2).

The King was doubly concerned to put an end to these examinations, since most of the miscarriages reflected upon him, though only some particular officers were directly accused, and besides, the Commons wasted the time, which, according to him, would have been better employed in considering the supplies he had demanded. He therefore pressed the Commons, by three several messages, to hasten the money-bill, telling them in his last message, that he intended to prorogue the Parliament the 4th of May. But, being informed, the House was not pleased with his message, because a Prorogation would have defeated all their proceedings against Delinquents, he let them know, the 24th of April, that he intended only an adjournment for three months; and withal desired, that the money-bill might be ready against the 4th of May.

Besides the supply, the House of Commons was employed in another affair, with which they were greatly affected. They began to discover the King's secret intentions, and believed, that under colour of easing the Presbyterians, his design was to obtain a general indulgence for all the Non-conformists, including the Papists under that general denomination. An insinuation in his Speech confirmed this suspicion. Wherefore, to stop the progress of a design so contrary to their principles, with regard both to Popery and Presbyterianism, they presented an address to the King, to pray him "That he would issue out his Proclamation for enforcing the laws against Conventicles; and that care might be taken for the preservation of the peace against all unlawful assemblies of Papists and Non-conformists."—The King, according to his usual custom, failed not to publish a Proclamation, declaring, "That upon information, that divers persons abusing the clemency used to the Dissenters, (even whilst it was under consideration to find out a way for the better union of his Protestant subjects) had of late openly held unlawful Assemblies and Conventicles, he would by no means permit such notorious contempts of himself and his laws to go unpunished, &c." He supposed, the Parliament was upon this union, because he had recommended it to them. But the Commons were far from thinking of this affair, unless by this union the King meant an entire conformity with the Church of England, which was not his intention.

At this time a great dispute arose between the two Houses, occasioned by Mr. Skinner a Merchant of London, who believing to have just cause of complaint against the East-India Company, brought the matter by petition into the House of Lords originally. The Lords, after an examination, relieved him in five thousand pounds costs. On the other hand, the Company having petitioned the Commons, Skinner was taken into custody, for applying originally to the Lords, in a Common Plea, which was not agreeable to the Law. The petition presented to the Commons by the East-India Company was voted scandalous by the Lords, and several conferences between the two Houses, were not capable to decide this difference. At last, the Commons voted "That whoever should be aiding or assisting in putting in execution the order or sentence of the House of Lords, in the case of Thomas Skinner against the East-India Company, should be deemed a betrayer of the rights and liberties of the Commons of England, and an infringer of the Privileges of the House."

The same day this vote passed in the House of Commons, being the 8th of May, the King came to the House of Peers, and passing the Bill for raising three hundred and ten thousand pounds by an imposition on wines and other liquors, and some other Acts, he adjourned the Parliament to the 11th of August. He adjourned it again a second time [to the 1st of March], and at last, prorogued it to the 19th of October 1669 (3).

I have already mentioned the affairs between France and Spain, and the alternative offered by the French King.

(1) This triple alliance was signed January 23. Temple's Lett. p. 59.

(2) Whereby the King was defrauded of above a hundred and fifteen thousand pounds. Edward, Tom. 3. p. 212.

(3) In the beginning of May, the Queen miscarried a second time. Idem, p. 220.

The Marquis of Castel-Rodrigo, or rather the Court of Louis XIV., not being in haste to make a choice, Louis XIV. February invaded Franch-Comté (1), and in less than a fortnight subdued the whole Province. This conquest however did not make him rise in his demands, but he was still willing to stand to the offer of the two conditions he had proposed. But the Court of Spain delayed, as much as possible, to declare upon the offered alternative, designing to engage England and the States in a war against France. Mean while, as the treaty of the Triple-League was directly contrary to the design of Spain, (the three allies having only engaged to take arms in case the King of France refused to stand to his proposal) it was not possible for the Court of Spain to accomplish their ends. At last, many tergiversations, the Marquis of Castel-Rodrigo declared, he accepted the first condition, by which France was to keep what had been conquered the last campaign. This choice greatly surprized the States, who had relied on the Spaniards accepting rather the second condition, which appeared less advantageous to them. But the policy of the Spanish Court was to throw England and the States into an unavoidable necessity of making war against France, if she should offer to pursue her conquest in the Netherlands.

This choice being made, the peace was no longer difficult. The town of Aix la Chapelle was agreed on for the place of treaty, and the Plenipotentiaries of France and Spain, of England, Sweden, and the States, repairing thither, the treaty was concluded and signed the second of May, after a fortnight's negotiation. The treaty contained in substance, That the King of France should keep possession of Charleroi, Binh, Aeth, Douay, Fort-de-la-Saape, Tournay, Oudenarde, Lisle, Armentieres, Courtray, Bergues, Furnes, with all their dependencies. The King of France, on his side, restored Franch-Comté to the Crown of Spain. The allied States were Guarantees of this Peace, and all other Princes and States were allowed to be so, if they pleased (2).

Though the treaty of Aix la Chapelle had considerably increased the power of France, the States-General of the United-Provinces believed it a great advantage, to have stopped the progress of the French arms. They ascribed to themselves the whole glory, though, indeed, the Triple-League would never have been thought of by them, had it not been first proposed by the King of England. To immortalize their glory, they struck a medal, on one side of which was seen Holland leaning against a trophy, and on the reverse, an inscription to this effect: That they had secured the Laws; reformed Religion; assisted, defended, and reconciled Kings; restored Freedom to the Ocean; procured by their Arms a glorious Peace, and established the Tranquillity of all Europe. On the other hand, Josuah Van Buntinghen, who had been employed in negotiating this peace, struck a medal, and compared himself to Josuah stopping the course of the sun. As the King of France had taken the sun for his device, the meaning of this medal could not be mistaken. But the States immediately suppressed it. As for the first, and some others, which discovered too great presumption, they were not broke till two years after. They had afterwards cause to repent of this insult offered to Louis XIV.

When I said, that Charles, in all appearance, proposed the Triple-League only to amuse the publick, and appease in some measure, the discontents of the people, which began to appear, I founded this conjecture, First, upon Sir William Temple's suspicion, that the King would not long continue in this resolution. This suspicion appears in several of his letters. But as they were writ to the Earl of Arlington, Secretary of State, he contented himself with insinuating his belief, without daring to speak too openly. Secondly, it has been seen in a letter of the King of France, to d'Estades, how little Charles concerned himself for the preservation of the Netherlands, since, believing, that Louis directed his views that way, he offered to let him make that conquest unmolested, without reserving an inch of land to himself, provided Louis would abandon the States-General. Thirdly, the sale of Dunkirk to France showed, that Louis's conquests in Flanders would give but little jealousy to Charles. In the fourth place, at the very time that all Europe was dissolved in joy for the conclusion of the Triple-League, Sir Thomas Clifford, the King's favorite, said openly, — Well, for all this noise, we must yet have another war with the Dutch before it be long. Fifthly, France herself did not discover much uneasiness at this Triple-Alliance. She not only insisted upon all her pretensions, but even Mr. de Lionne, Secretary of State, writing to d'Estades on occasion of this Triple-Alliance, has these words, — If the Dutch enter into Alliances contrary to the inter- ests of his Majesty, we shall not be so much troubled at it as they imagined: I know what I say, and upon what foundation I speak it. If to this be added, King Charles's strange conduct afterwards, in making a League with France against Holland, it cannot but be suspected, that there was at that time a secret correspondence between France and England. Sixthly, events are commonly the best interpreters of men's actions. And it will presently appear, that Charles made but little account of his engagements, entered into by the Triple-Alliance; but it is not time yet to speak of these matters.

After the removal of the Earl of Clarendon, the face of the English Court was entirely changed. The King, more at ease by the absence of a troublesome Minister, whose great dislike to his person, and very preference was a reproach to his conduct, gave himself up to his pleasures, without any reserve or discretion. The Duke of Buckingham, who had no Religion, and gloried in his debaucheries, and Wilnot Earl of Rochester, the greatest wit, and the most satirical and licentious Poet of his age, were his principal favorites. With these two men, and his mistresses, the King spent almost his whole time, and it was with difficulty that his Ministers could find an opportunity to speak to him of his affairs. Pleasures and debauches were the sole entertainments of the Court, and vice appeared there bare-faced. In a word, England had never seen a more disorderly Court, and unhappily, their example had but too much influence on the rest of the people. The King was prodigal to excess. Besides his standing revenues, which, as we have seen, amounted to twelve hundred thousand pounds Sterling, he had consumed the eighteen thousand thousand pounds given him the last year by the Parliament, in uses for which that money was not intended. This year, he had asked a supply of his Parliament, pretending a necessity to build some new ships of war, and to put a great fleet to sea, in maintenance of his engagements by the Triple-Alliance. The Parliament had granted him three hundred and ten thousand pounds, but the Act not passing till two days after the signing of the treaty of Aix la Chapelle, not a single ship was built, and the necessity of putting a fleet to sea, vanished at once. Notwithstanding this, he was always in want, and his revenues perpetually anticipated.

But a still greater misfortune to England was, that only Great Protestants, or men of no Religion, had any credit at Court. The Duke of Buckingham, the Earl of Rochester, and the King's Mistresses, were not persons who gave themselves any trouble to stop the progress of Popery. The Earl of Arlington, Secretary of State, was, like the King, a distinguished, and Clifford, a declared Papist. The Duke of Tor was not only a Catholic, but also very zealous for his Religion. Being considered as presumptive heir to the Crown, great court was made to him, and with the more application, as his revenues being large, and his management frugal, he had wherewithal to gain Courtiers. It may be judged, that his zeal had suffered him not to advance Protestants to places of trust, when he could introduce persons of his Religion. He had so powerful a party at Court, and so many creatures about the King's person, that he was in a manner absolute there, and directed the resolutions of the Council. Lastly, if the King had any Religion, he was most inclined to Popery. He found, besides, a considerable advantage in caring for the Papists, whom he esteemed his firm friends, whereas he could not help dreading the zeal of the Protestants, in case they should discover, he had abused their Religion.

After this view of the state of the English Court, it is easy to conceive, that those who had most credit, and access to the King, could hardly intend the benefit of the Kingdom. Every one of his most intimate Counsellors would have been glad to see the King absolute, that he might have at command the whole riches of England to lavish upon them. The King himself was so uneasily to be continually forced to devise fresh pretences to demand money of his Parliament, that he could have wished to be delivered from that trouble, and to have free liberty to take what he wanted without asking. But on the other hand, he thought himself obliged to proceed circumspectly, the example of his father not permitting him to engage in the same course, before he had taken greater precautions. This was the reason, that for some years the Court-projects were executed gradually, and with great dissimulation, notwithstanding the warm temper of the Duke of Tor, and the eagerness of the Papists. For it may be affirmed, that the King alone opposed their career, whether out of fear or prudence.

This summer, the King diverted himself with making several Progresses into the country, to view the ports and 1668. the navy. He sent a squadron into the Mediterranean, commanded by Sir Thomas Allen, who forced the Algerines to a peace very advantageous to England.

Nothing more of any importance passed during the rest of this year, except some Embassies, which the sequel requires to be mentioned. Sir William Godolphin was sent to the Court of Spain; Mr. Ralph Montague was first Envoy, and soon after Ambassador to France; the Earl of Carlisle went Ambassador to Stockholm (1), and Sir William Temple Ambassador extraordinary to the States-General. On the other hand, Monsieur Colbert was sent from France to reside as Ambassador at the English Court.

There were also some changes at Court: Among others, Sir Thomas Clifford was made Treasurer of the Household, the Duke of Monmouth, the King's natural son, was made Captain of his life-guard of horse; Sir John Trevor, lately returned from France, where he had been Envoy, was sworn one of his Majesty's principal Secretaries of State, on the resignation of Sir William Morrice, to whom was given ten thousand pounds Sterling.

This year died Algernon Percy, Earl of Northumberland, who was succeeded by his son (2); the famous Poets Davanant, and Denham; and the great soldier Sir William Waller, so often mentioned in the History of the civil wars. He had been imprisoned by the Independent Parliament, and confined till the King's restoration, when he was delivered, being considered on account of his sufferings as a sort of Royalist.

Though the year 1669, produced no memorable events, it was however fatal to Europe, since it was, probably, this year that measures began to be taken for the strict union of France with England. At least, it appears in Sir William Temple's Letters, that Mr. Puffendorf, who had this year been sent Envoy from Sweden to the Court of France, calling at the Hague in his return, said to Sir William Temple (3), that a Minister at the French Court had assured him, that the Triple-alliance would not subsist, and that the English Court had already changed their measures. The same Mr. Puffendorf saw a letter in Marshal Turenne's hands at Paris, from Monsieur Colbert the French Ambassador in London, wherein that Ambassador, speaking of the English Court, has these words:—I have at last made them sensible of the subtile extent of his Majesty's liberality. So, it is scarce to be doubted, that Colbert's embassy to London was designed to gain or corrupt the English Court, and that he succeeded. It is the time only that is questioned, since the thing itself appeared manifestly in the sequel.

The latter end of March, Cosmo de Medicis Prince of Tuscany arrived in England, where he was received with all the respect due to his birth and particular merit. As his design was only to see England after he had visited Spain and France, he was thence, by order of the King, whatever was curious, and particularly the two Universities.

Shortly after his departure, Prince George of Denmark came also to pay the King a visit, but made no long stay then in England.

The 9th of July the large and magnificent Theatre at Oxford, built at the expence of Dr. Sheldon Archbishop of Canterbury, was opened. He was Chancellor of the University, and shortly after resigned that honour to the Duke of Ormond. The Duke was still Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, but soon after was removed, and succeeded by the Lord Roberts, who was not of the Duke's principles.

In all appearance, the King had now formed a sort of scheme with regard to Religion. This was to incorporate the Presbyterians with the Church of England, and procure a Toleration for all the other Non-conformists. He might have in this a double view. First, to gain the Presbyterians, who were very numerous in the Kingdom, and perhaps make use of them, thus united with the Church of England, to check the fury of the Episcopals, who were not less enemies to the Papists than to the Presbyterians. If the King had not been a Papist, which was then little known, it would be difficult to understand this policy, since, supposing him a zealous member of the Church of England, what occasion had he to guard against her? But being a Catholic, the advantages of these precautions are very visible. His second view, universally allowed, and afterwards manifestly discovered, was, by procuring an Indulgence for all Non-conformists without distinction, to procure also the same favor for the Papists. In pursuance of this scheme, the King and his Ministers affected to express great kindness for the Presbyterians, and this kindness encouraged them to appear more openly, and hold their assemblies with less caution and secrecy. In short, Sir Orlando Bridgeman Lord-Keeper, whether privy to the King's secret Intentions, or led by motives of mildness and humanity, acquainting two of the most eminent Presbyterian Ministers (4), that he desired a conference with them. They waited on him accordingly, and he freely told them, he designed to make them some proposals for a comprehension for the Presbyterians, and a Toleration for the Independents and the rest. Upon this occasion, these two Presbyterian Ministers had several conferences with two Episcopal Doctors (5); one of whom was Chaplain to the Lord-Keeper. When it is considered, that in the Savoy conference, at the beginning of this Reign, the two parties could not agree in any one point, and that in the present conference an agreement was immediately made, it can hardly be doubted, that the two Episcopal Divines came fully prepared to facilitate the accommodation. However this be, they agreed among them, concerning Re-ordination, which was the point they most differed about, That all Presbyterian Ministers who had been already ordained, should be admitted into the Ministry of the Church of England with this form of words, Take thou legal authority to preach the word of God, and administer the Holy Sacraments, in any congregation of England, where thou shalt be lawfully appointed thereunto. This was not properly a new Ordination, but only a power to exercise their ministry in the Church of England. It was also agreed, that Ceremonies should be left indifferent, so that they might be used or not, according as every one should think fit; and that the Liturgy should be altered: Moreover, that those who could not be comprehended should be indulged: and for security to the Government, the names of the Teachers, and all the members of the congregations should be registred. Agreeably to this scheme, the Lord Chief Justice Hale undertook to draw up a Bill against the ensuing Parliament, and the Lord-Keeper promised to support it with all his power. It is easy to perceive, this project, however necessary to the King's designs, was however directly contrary to the principles of the Parliament, who were averse to all condescension. Accordingly it came to nothing.

Mean time, whether the secret of what passed in the conferences was not well kept, or the Non-conformists, incouraged by the Court, assumed too much liberty, the Archbishop of Canterbury resolved to use his utmost endeavours to break their measures. For this purpose he writ to all his Suffragan Bishops a circular letter, requiring them to take a very particular account of them in their Dioceses. When he was provided with the necessary informations, he went to the King, and obtained from him a Proclamation to enforce the laws against conventicles, and particularly the Act for restraining Non-conformists from inhabiting in Corporations. This Proclamation was executed like those against the Papists. For, about two months after, the King caused the Non-conformist Ministers to be told, that he inclined to favour them, and if they would address him for his clemency and the liberty they enjoyed under him, it would be accepted. Whereupon such an address was prepared, and presented to the King at the Earl of Arlington's lodgings, who received it graciously, and returned a favorable answer (6).

The Parliament, according to the prorogation, met the 19th of October. The King in a short speech demanded money for the discharge of his debts, and briefly propoled the union of the two Kingdoms of England and Scotland. Then the Lord-Keeper enlarged upon these points. But the Commons, instead of taking the King's speech into consideration, proceeded upon other affairs. The public accounts were examined (7), with the uses to which the King had applied the money given him by the Parliament, and Sir George Carteret, who had the keeping of some of the books being found very blameable, was expelled the House. Then they addressed the King to thank him for his Proclamation against conventicles, praying him to continue the same care to suppress them for the future.

But, not contented with this, they appointed a committee to enquire into the behaviour of the Non-conformists. This committee reported, "That there were divers conventicles and other seditious meetings near the Parliament, where great numbers of dissaffected persons frequently met, which was not only an affront to the Government, but also of imminent danger to both Houses, and the peace of the Kingdom." It seems, the House was ashamed to show so much resentment against the Presbyterians, solely on the account of Religion, and therefore 1669. took great care to interest the State, in order to create a belief, that the Presbyterians were guilty of sedition. For they were always included under the general denomination of Non-conformists, so that it was believed they ought to be responsible for the conduct of the other sects, with whom however they had no communication. Upon the report of the committee, the House declared, that they would firmly adhere to the King in the maintenance of the established Government of the Church and State, against all enemies whatsoever. When it is considered, that the State had never enjoyed a more perfect tranquillity than at present, it can hardly be questioned, that this Declaration of the Commons was owing to the forementioned project, which, doubtless, was come to their knowledge, and of which they were resolved to prevent the execution, by indirectly declaring how much they were against it.

At last the Commons voted the King a supply of four hundred thousand pounds. But, before they considered of the means to raise this sum, they revived the debate concerning Stinner and the East-India Company, and came to several resolutions, which the Lords looked upon as so many violations of their privileges in point of judicature. The difference between the two Houses daily increasing, the King saw, it would be very difficult to reconcile them, and that the Commons would not proceed upon the money-bill till this affair was adjusted; and as he had no room to expect an agreement, he prorogued the Parliament the 11th of December, to the 14th of February following.

The Parliament of Scotland met the same day with that of England. But before I speak of the transactions of this Parliament, it will not be improper, briefly to shew the character of the Duke of Lauderdale, the King's High-Commissioner. This Lord made so great a figure in this Reign, both in England and Scotland, that his character must not be thought foreign to our History.

John Maitland, Earl (afterwards Duke) of Lauderdale, was, during the troubles in Scotland, a rigid Presbyterian, a zealous Covenanter, and a distinguished enemy of the royal authority. But he turned to the King's interest in 1647, when Duke Hamilton invaded England, for the service of Charles I. From that time, he was looked upon in Scotland as an enemy of his Country. But, after the arrival of Charles II. in Scotland, and the compulsion of the differences between the Scots, he followed the King into England, was taken at the battle of Worcester, and confined in several prisons, till the King's restoration. During his imprisonment he had great impressions of Religion on his mind. But, after the King had received him into his favour and Council, he so entirely wore them out, that scarce any trace of them was left. Whether he knew the secret sentiments of the King and Duke of York, with regard to Religion, and the Government, or only suspected them, he imagined, the best way to preserve his favour, was to enter into all the King's supposed views, and endeavour to render him absolute in both Kingdoms. Upon the King's restoration, it was debated in Council, whether Episcopacy should be restored in Scotland. The Earl of Lauderdale strenuously opposed it, for an extraordinary reason, namely, "That if the King pleased the Scots, he would be sure of them in order to the executing of any design he might afterwards be engaged in." This advice, though it was not followed, was acceptable to the King, and riveted the Duke in his favour. The resolution to restore Episcopacy having been executed, no man appeared more ardent against the Presbyterians, nor had they a more violent persecutor. I shall doubtless have occasion to say more of him hereafter, but this suffices to give some idea of his character.

It was through his means and intrigues that the Parliament, held this year in Scotland, passed an act which raised the King's supremacy higher than ever. The same Parliament approved the raising of the Militia, and it was enacted, that it should be kept up, and be ready to march into any of the King's dominions, for any cause in which his Majesty's authority, power, or greatness, should be concerned; and that orders should be transmitted to them from the Council, without any mention of orders from the King. It was not at first known, what could be the intent of an Act which seemed to take the Militia out of the King's hands, and put it into the power of the Council. But it was afterwards perceived, that this was Lauderdale's contrivance, that if the King should have occasion to call in the Scottish army, it should not be necessary to send any orders himself, but that the Council, upon a secret intimation, might do it without order; and then, if the design should miscarry, it should lie on the Council, who had raised it up, and so none about him be concerned. It shews, that projects were then forming to render the King absolute in England.

This year, the King's mother died in France, the 10th of August, in the sixtieth year of her age. The famous Duke of Albemarle died likewise the 3d of January, and was succeeded in his estate and honour by Christopher his only son. To these deaths may be added that of the famous Pyrrhus, the indefatigable author of more than two hundred treatises, most of them of little esteem (1).

The Parliament meeting the 14th of February, the King told the two Houses, "That when they last met, he asked them a supply, and now asked it again with great instance: The uneasiness and straits of his affairs could not continue without very ill effects to the whole Kingdom. He let them know, that having fully informed himself of the expences of the last war, he could assure them, that no part of the moneys they had given him, had been diverted to other uses. But on the contrary, a very great sum had been raised out of his standing revenue and credit, and a very great debt contracted, and all for the war. Lastly, he recommended to them, not to suffer any occasion of difference between themselves to be revived."

The Lord-Keeper then made a speech, which I think necessary to insert at length, to shew the King's confidence in this Parliament, which had already granted him such large sums.

My Lords, and you Knights, Citizens, and Burgeesses of the House of Commons.

"At your last meeting, his Majesty did acquaint you with the great occasions he had for a supply, and that he had forbore to ask it sooner, more in consideration of giving some time for the ease of the People, after the burden of the war, than that the condition of his affairs could so long have wanted: And his Majesty hath commanded me now to speak more fully and plainly upon this subject. His Majesty hath not only by his Ministers, but in his own royal person, examined the accounts, touching the expences of the last war, and hath thought himself concerned to let you know, that all the supplies which you gave him for the war, have been by him applied to the war, and no part of them to any other uses: Nay, so far from it, that if the preparations towards the war shall be taken to be the use of the war, as they must be, a great part of his own revenue, to many hundred thousands of pounds, hath been employed also, and swallowed up in the charge of the war, and what did necessarily relate to it. To which may be added the great debts contracted by his Majesty in the war, and the great charges in the repairs of the hulls of his ships, and putting his navy into such a condition as it was before. Besides, his Majesty thinks it ought to be considered, that when the charges of the war were at the highest, the inevitable effects of it, and those other calamities, which it pleased God at that time to bring upon us, did make so great a diminution of his revenues, that, besides all other accidents and disadvantages, the loss that he sustained in three branches of his revenue, in his Customs, Excise, and Hearth-money, by reason of the war, the plague, and the fire, did amount to little less than to six hundred thousand pounds. Thus you see, that though your supplies have been great, yet the charges occasioned by the war, and the calamities which accompanied it, have been greater: And that the debt which is left upon his Majesty, and which he complains of, hath been contracted by the war, and not by the diversion of the monies designed for it.

"His Majesty hath commanded me to say one thing more to you upon this subject, That he did not enter into the war upon any private inclination or appetite of his own. The first step he made towards it, did arise from your advice, and the promises of your assistance: but if the charges and accidents of the war have out-gone all your supplies, and left him under the burden of this debt, he thinks, that as well the justice to your promise, as the duty and loyalty you have always shewed him, will oblige you to relieve him from it: And the rather, when you shall seriously consider, how uneasy this Burden must be to him, and what ill consequences the continuance under it must draw upon all his affairs; in which particular you, and every person you represent in this nation, will be concerned, as well as himself. His Majesty doth therefore command me in his name, to desire you once more, and to conjure you, by that constant duty and loyalty which you have always expressed to him, and by all the concernment you have for the support of the honour and safety of his Government, to provide such a supply for him at this time, as may bear proportion to the pressing occasions

(1) Letitius was a considerable instrument in the Restoration, was received into favour, had the Records of the Times committed to him, and died a Member of the present Parliament, being one of the Representatives for the City of Bark.

1669-70. "that he hath, and to the state of his affairs at home and abroad; and so speedily and so effectually, as may answer the ends for which he hath desired it. His Majesty hath further commanded me, to put you in mind of what was at your last meeting proposed to you concerning an Union between the two Kingdoms, and to let you know, that the Parliament of Scotland, hath since declared to his Majesty, That such Commissioners as his Majesty shall name, shall be authorized on their part, to treat with Commissioners for this Kingdom upon the grounds and conditions of the union. His Majesty therefore thought fit now again to recommend it to you, to take that matter effectually into your consideration."

to the King.

It would have been cruel not to be moved with the King's wants, after having so gloriously maintained a war against Holland, for which the Parliament had granted him but five millions five hundred and fifty thousand pounds Sterling, since the peace. Wherefore the Commons, as an effectual mark of their affection for the King, and of their reliance on the truth of the Keeper's Speech, voted the King a supply capable to deliver him from his heavy burden. For this purpose they prepared two Bills, one to lay a duty upon all Wines and Vinegar imported into the Kingdom, from the 24th of June 1670, to the 24th of June 1678; the other, for the advancing the sale of his Majesty's Fee-Farm Rents, and other Rents. The first is computed at five hundred and sixty thousand pounds Sterling; the other, is believed to have raised more than double that sum, so that he could depend upon seventeen hundred thousand pounds. Thus the King received for this glorious war with Holland, seven millions five hundred and sixty thousand pounds Sterling, which amount to eighty-two millions five hundred and sixty thousand Dutch florins. And yet, there are English Writers who seem to triumph, that this war cost the States forty millions.

The difference between the two Houses being revived this session, the King, fearing the consequences, summoned both Houses to Whitehall, and proposed to them an expedient to end it; namely, by razing all Entries and Records, Votes and Resolutions concerning Skinner's affair, to which they consented, and thereby the quarrel was appeased, which was agreed to, and so the dispute was at an end.

Address of the abolish Non-conformity and Papists.

This agreement produced an address, presented jointly to the King by both Houses the 11th of March, to pray him to give order for the suppression of Conventicles in and near London and Westminster, and to put the laws in execution against Popish Recusants. The King answered, that effectual course should be taken in both cases.

1670. The 11th of April, the King came to the House of Peers, and passed twelve Bills, among which were the two money Bills, and a third for the suppression of seditious Conventicles. The substance of this Act was, that, "If any person upwards of sixteen, should be present at any Assembly, Conventicle, or Meeting, under colour or pretence of any exercise of Religion, in any other manner, than according to the Liturgy and Practice of the Church of England, where there were five Persons, or more, besides those of the household; in such cases the offenders were to pay five Shillings for the first offence, and ten for the second. And the Preachers and Teachers in any such Meetings, were to forfeit twenty pounds for the first, and forty for the second offence. And lastly, those who suffered any such Conventicles in their houses, barns, yards, &c. were likewise to forfeit twenty pounds (1)." Most of the English Historians, attached to the Church of England, endeavour to excuse the severity of this Act, by saying, it was made more upon political, than upon religious accounts. But this is always by means of the general name of Non-conformists, under which the Presbyterians were comprized, though, since the King's reformation, they had never been concerned in any insurrection, or ill-design against the Government.

adjourned.

After passing these Acts, the King adjourned the Parliament to the 24th of October.

It seems, that hitherto the King had reason to be pleased with a Parliament, which, besides a standing revenue of twelve hundred thousand pounds Sterling, had granted him solely for the war with Holland, above seven millions and a half, without reckoning so many other extraordinary sums given him before the war. This Parliament, supposing the King a zealous member of the Protestant Church of England, desired but two things, which, upon that supposition he might readily grant. The one was, to come into their views and measures for the destruction of the Presbyterians; the other to disable the Papists from giving any jealousy to the Protestants. On the other hand, the Parliament might justly suppose, that after having carried the Royal Prerogative so high, the King had reason to be pleased, and would endeavour to preserve a happy union, with a Parliament so devoted to him. It is certain, if the King had entirely complied with the Parliament in these two articles, and confined his Prerogative within the extensive bounds which the Parliament seemed to prescribe to it, he might have spent his days with more happiness, tranquillity, and plenty, than any of his predecessors. But the Parliament's suppositions being false, it is not surprising, that the King would not enter into their views. Instead of being zealous for the Protestant Religion, his intention was to overturn it. Instead of destroying the Presbyterians, his design was to grant them an Indulgence, in order to have a pretence to procure the fame for the Papists. Instead of being content with the power ascribed him by the Parliament, he thought it unworthy a King to found the extent of his authority upon Acts of Parliament only. Besides, it was a pain to him to be forced to demand money, and to use for that purpose pretences notoriously false, tho' the Parliament seemed to be satisfied with them. It would have been more agreeable to him to say, It is my will and pleasure, than to be obliged to use humble intreaties to the Commons. This his favorites were continually representing to him, and to this the example of what he had himself seen practised in neighbouring States strongly prompted him. He was therefore impatient to free himself from this yoke of the Parliament, and the more, as by augmenting his power, he should be better able to countenance the Papists, and introduce their religion, which was his own as well as his brother's. But if Father Orleans the Jesuit is to be credited, these were not the motives which induced the King to take other resolutions. "It was solely the indignation of his Ministers to see a republican spirit creeping into the Parliament, and engaging them in so many proceedings against the royal authority. Among other things, the Triple-alliance into which the republican-cabal had forced the King, contrary to his inclination, appeared to the ministers an audacious usurpation upon the royal prerogative, the consequences of which were to be prevented. Full of these resentments, they persuaded the King to render himself absolute, in pursuance of the rights of his Crown, and the laws of the Kingdom; to confine the Parliament within the bounds prescribed by immemorial custom, and not to suffer a mixture of a republic with a monarchy, introduced by violence and encroachments, for fear this mixture should in time produce a monstrous Anarchy, and expose England to a horrible confusion, like that from whence she was so lately delivered."

I shall make no remark on the little foundation this writer had to ascribe a republican spirit to this Parliament, nor on the King's being forced into the Triple-alliance by the pretended Republican cabal, nor lastly on the maxims he establishes with respect to the constitution of the English Government; because every unbiassed reader, is, I suppose, able to see clearly the weakness of this reasoning. But, since Father Orleans says himself that he was informed by James II, of the particulars of his own and his Brother's reign, I believe this Historian's word may be taken, that at the time I am speaking of, Charles had resolved to render himself absolute. This is a truth which must always be remembered, if we desire to understand all the events of this reign.

This resolution being taken, the King easily saw, that the execution of it required an artful and cautious conduct, and such secret and imperceptible methods, as would not too plainly discover his intentions. For he could not suppose, that because he desired to be absolute, the people of England would immediately give up their liberties and privileges. It was therefore necessary, to lead them to it insensibly and by degrees, and to that end he wanted a secret council composed of few persons, in whom he might entirely confide, and whose interest it was to accomplish this design. The ordinary council consisting of twenty-one persons, was not proper to conduct this affair; for, besides that some Counsellors had a right to their places, as for instance the Archbishop of Canterbury, it was very difficult to engage so many persons of the first rank in such a plot. To effect therefore this undertaking with the more caution, the King established a Cabinet-council of five persons only, namely,

Clifford,
Arlington, Buckingham, Abley,
Lauderdale.

As the initial letters of these five names compose the word CABAL, this secret Council was from thence called the Cabal. But before I proceed to the resolutions taken by The King's designs.

Extract from Father Orleans's History.

He seems to be absolute.

The King establishes a secret Council, which is called the Cabal.
Echard, III. p. 251.

1. This Act was passed in such a manner, that many of the trading men began to talk of removing with their families out of the Kingdom. But the King put it off to further severities. Echard, p. 270.

1670. this council, it will be necessary to give a brief character of the members.

Chancellors of the Court of Chancery.

Sir Thomas Clifford, according to Father Orleans, only wanted a stage, where found reason and virtue were more frequent, than at this time in England, to appear superior to the others. He was a declared and known Papist, so that he took no pains to disguise his religion. It was he who, after the Triple-alliance was concluded, said, notwithstanding all this noise, we must yet have another war with Holland. As the event justified his prediction, very probably, the scheme I have just mentioned, was then formed, and he in the secret.

Temple, R. Coke.

Earl of Arlington.

Henry Bennet, Earl of Arlington, Secretary of State, passed for a man of the least genius of the five, but this was well supplied by his great experience, and knowledge in foreign affairs. It is pretended, that being one of the King's retinue in his journey to Fontarabia in the year 1659, he was the principal instrument to induce him to change his religion. However that be, he was truly a Catholic, tho', with the King, he outwardly professed the Protestant Religion (1). This is now universally agreed.

Duke of Buckingham.

[George Villiers] Duke of Buckingham, the King's favorite, had a very lively wit. He might have made a great Minister of State, had not his strong passion for pleasures, and all sorts of debauches, diverted him from business. But nothing could tempt him to quit a dissolute life, to which he had been used from his youth. He gloried in having no Religion, and was reckoned an Atheist. Such a favorite was no great honour to the King (2).

Earl of Shaftsbury.

Sir Anthony Ashley Cooper, created two years after Earl of Shaftsbury, was one of the greatest Geniuses of England had produced for many years. This is the testimony equally given him by friends and enemies. Father Orleans gives the following character of him, "He was the most capable of the five to manage any important undertaking, and was the soul of this I am now speaking of. He had a vast genius, was penetrating, bold, and equally steady, both on the right and the wrong side; a constant friend, but an implacable enemy, and the more dangerous, as being void of all Religion and Conscience, it was the easier for him to plot, because he was not deterred by the number or enormity of any crimes, when he judged them necessary to preserve himself, or destroy those who had incurred his hatred." I shall observe here, that this character of the Earl of Shaftsbury is not founded upon what he had done before his admission into the Cabinet-Council, but upon what he did afterwards. For, leaving the King's party for that of the People and Parliament, the Royalists ascribe to his intrigues alone, all the troubles which afterwards happened. Mr. Lock speaks otherwise of him. It is true, he says nothing advantageous of him in respect of Religion. But however this be, in allowing the character given by Father Orleans, it is easy to see, what sort of men the King thought he wanted for the execution of his designs (3).

Mem. of Shaftsbury.

Duke of Lauderdale.

The Duke of Lauderdale was the most proper of the five to serve the King in this affair. To describe a Lord, who had so great a share in the affairs of England and Scotland in this reign, I shall insert here, the characters given of him by Father Orleans, Mr. Echard, and Dr. Burnet Bishop of Salisbury.

The first contents himself with saying, that the Duke of Lauderdale, Secretary of State in Scotland, was a very subtle man, and a refined Politician.

F.H.P. 244.

Mr. Echard says of the Duke, "The enlarging of the King's power and grandeur in Scotland, was much owing to the management of the present commissioner Lauderdale, who had formerly been as much for depressing, as he was now for exalting the Prerogative. From the time of his commission, the Scots are said to calculate the date of all the ensuing inconveniences in this, and the following reign. For having there undertaken to make the King's power absolute, and arbitrary, he strained the Royal Prerogative to all kinds of excesses; and assumed to himself a sort of a lawless administration of affairs, the exercise of which was supposed to be granted to him, upon the large promises he had made: And more apprehending other men's officious interfering than disturbing his own abilities, he, in time, took care to make himself his Majesty's sole informer, as well as his sole Secretary, and by that means, not only upon pretence of the King's Prerogative, the affairs of Scotland were disposed of in the Court of England, without any notice taken of the King's Council in Scotland; but strict observation was also made of all Scotchmen that came to the English Court; and to attempt an address, and access to his Majesty, otherwise than by Lauderdale's mediation, was to hazard his perpetual resentment. By these ways he gradually made himself the almost only significant person of the whole Scottish nation; and in Scotland itself, procured to himself that sovereign authority, as to name the Privy-councillors, to place and remove the Lords of the Session, and Exchequer, to grant gifts and pensions, to levy and disband forces, to appoint general officers, and to transact all matters of importance."

This shews to a demonstration, how much the King was delighted with the absolute power exercised in his name in Scotland, and, consequently, that he would have been glad to enjoy the like power in England.

If I should transcribe all that is said of Duke Lauderdale, by Dr. Burnet, I should, I fear, be too tedious, and therefore I shall content myself with selecting a passage, where he is best described. — "The Earl of Lauderdale made a very ill appearance: He was very big: His tongue was too big for his mouth, which made him bellow all that he talked to: And his whole manner was rough and boisterous, and very unfit for a Court. He was very learned, not only in Latin, in which he was a master, but in Greek and Hebrew. He had read a great deal of Divinity, and almost all the Historians ancient and modern; so that he had great materials. He had with these an extraordinary memory, and a copious, but unpolished expression. He was a man, as the Duke of Buckingham called him to me, of a blundering understanding. He was haughty beyond expression, abject to those he saw he must stoop to, but imperious to all others. He had a violence of passion, that carried him often to fits like madness, in which he had no temper. If he took a thing wrong, it was a vain thing to study to convince him: That would rather provoke him to swear: he would never be of another mind: He was to be let alone: And perhaps he would have forgot what he had said, and come about of his own accord. He was the coldest friend, and the violentest enemy I ever knew: I felt it too much, not to know it. He at first seemed to despise wealth; but he delivered himself up afterwards to Luxury and sensuality: And, by that means, he ran into a vast expence, and stuck at nothing that was necessary to support it. In his long imprisonment he had great impressions of Religion on his mind: But he wore these out so entirely, that scarce any trace of them was left. His great experience in affairs, his ready compliance with every thing that he thought would please the King, and his bold offering at the most desperate Councils, gained him such an interest in the King, that no attempt against him, nor complaint of him, could ever shake it, till a decay of strength and understanding forced him to let go his hold. He was in his principles much against Popery, and arbitrary Government: And yet by a fatal train of passions and interests, he made way for the former, and had almost established the latter. And whereas some, by a smooth deportment, made the first beginnings of tyranny less discernable and unacceptable, he, by the fury of his behaviour, heightened the severity of his Ministry, which was like the cruelty of an Inquisition, than the legality of justice. With all this he was a Presbyterian, and retained his aversion to King Charles I, and his party, to his death."

If to these five members of the Cabal are joined, as in reason they ought, the King and the Duke of York, it will be found that all the seven were for an absolute and arbitrary Government; and that, with regard to Religion, four were Papists, namely, the King, the Duke, Arlington and Clifford, and three without any Religion, or at least they considered it only as an engine of state, these were Buckingham, Ashley, and Lauderdale.

It would be difficult to know the transactions of the Cabal, if Father Orleans intrusted by King James II, had not told us that a war with Holland was there resolved, in order to furnish the King with a pretence to keep on foot both land and sea forces. For it is manifest, that such a design could be accomplished, but by force or fear. The

(1) In the whole course of his Ministry, he seemed to have made it a maxim, that the King should grow no more to Popery, but that all his affairs would be spoiled, if ever he turned that way, which made the Papists become his mortal enemies. — p. 39.

(2) Burnet says farther of him, That he had the art of turning persons and things into what he pleased beyond any man of his age. He possessed the King with him a frequent subject of raillery, p. 52.

(3) Burnet says of him, That as to Religion he was a Deist at heart: He had a wonderful facility in speaking to a popular Assembly, but had not the like force in building up. He had a general knowledge of the world, and a great deal of sense, but he was not a great scholar. His strength lay in the knowledge of England, and of all the considerable men in it. He knew the fine, strong understandings and their weaknesses, and how to apply himself dexterously to them. He often changed sides, and gloried in doing so. He was a very dissipated fellow. But his reputation was so high, that he died in good time for his Family and party. — p. 57.

pretence for this war was to be taken from the dispute about the Flag, which might easily be renewed, and from the general complaints of the English merchants concerning their commerce, of which so great use had been made for undertaking the former war. "But, adds Father Orleans, 'The true reason of making this war upon Holland, was the secret correspondence between the Republicans of England and the Dutch, who were incessantly exciting them to rebellion, and to shake off the yoke of Monarchy, being ever ready to support those that should attack it.' This seems to contradict what the same author advances a few lines before, namely, that the true ground of this war was to furnish the King with a pretence for raising an army. There is however no contradiction: for it must be considered, that the design of the King and the Cabal concerned two points, which went hand in hand, and formed properly but one design; namely, to introduce an arbitrary Government, and to extirpate the Protestant Religion. As it could not be expected, that the English would tamely give up their Religion and Liberty without any resistance, it was natural to begin with depriving them of the only assistance they could hope for, by attacking the Dutch, and disabling them to succour England. Those therefore who are called by Father Orleans the Republicans of England, were the persons, who, it was supposed, would oppose the King's designs, as well Episcopals as Presbyterians, and the Republicans properly so called. It is therefore clear, that the true reason of making war upon the States, was as much to put it out of their power to assist the English, as to have a pretence for raising forces, and that this was but one and the same reason.

Some time before, Mr. Colbert de Craissy, the French Ambassador at London, having founded the King and his Ministers, concerning a strict alliance with his master, found them very favorably disposed (1), especially when he had told them, that the design of this alliance was to humble the pride of the States-General. Indeed, nothing could more promote their intention, than the concurrence of France to destroy the hated and formidable power of the Dutch, who were alone capable of assisting the English.

Some pretend, that the King then signed a secret Treaty with France; but if so, this treaty, in all appearance, was only in general terms, which required more particular articles. However this be, the King of France, to finish this affair so happily begun, came to Dunkirk on pretence of viewing the Rihbank which was then raising; and bringing with him the Duchess of Orleans his Sister-in-law, she took occasion from the neighbourhood of England to desire leave to visit her Brother, which was readily granted, since every thing was already concerted. She was met by the King at Dover, where she arrived the 15th of May, and stayed above a fortnight amidst continual pleasures and diversions. But these diversions hindered her not from executing the commission she was charged with, which was, as it is pretended, to make a proposal to her Brother in the name of his most Christian Majesty, of insuring him an absolute authority over his Parliament, and restoring the Catholic Religion in his three Kingdoms, as soon as the States should be sufficiently humbled. Though the conferences between the King and his Sister were managed with great secrecy, the events with which they were followed, clearly discovered that this was the subject of them; and Abbot Primi and Father Orleans positively say it, except what concerns Religion, which Popish authors and some others scruple to own, for fear of justifying the suspicious afterwards entertained by the Parliament, and the measures they would have taken to preserve Religion from utter destruction (2).

An accident which happened shortly after, seemed likely to break the good understanding between the Courts of France and England. The 10th of June, the Duchess of Orleans in perfect health, called, according to custom, for a glass of Succory water at four in the afternoon. She had no sooner drank it, but she found herself ill, and her pain increasing, she died about two in the morning. She was universally believed to be poisoned, but the author of her death is not so unanimously agreed on, though the Duke of Orleans her husband was by many secretly accused (3). The first account of her death was brought to the King by Sir Thomas Armstrong, who told him plainly, what the French thought of this sudden death, adding, that though he was in the chamber of the deceased at six the same morning, the stench of the corps was so strong, that he could hardly bear the room. The King could not help falling into tears, and expressing himself very passionately against the Duke of Orleans, saying, He was a-----! but presently, Tom, do not speak of it. Presently after, arrived the Marquiss of Bellfonds with the news, and to pay the compliment of condolence from the French King. He gave an account of the Duchess's death, in the most proper manner to remove all suspicion.

The King was soon comforted for the loss of his Sister, and not thinking that this death, uncommon as it was, ought to break, or even retard, the measures taken with the Court of France, he sent the Duke of Buckingham to Paris, to conclude and sign the Dover agreement. The pretence used by the Duke of Buckingham for his journey, was his desire to see France, and learn the language.

In September, Lewis XIV. made an irruption into Lor-rain by his General Marshal de Cregui. The Duke, who had not expected to be attacked, was obliged to fly, and leave his Duchy a prey to the Marshal, who took possession in the name of his master. In vain did the Duke hope for the intercession of Charles to the King of France, in return for the money lent and given him in his exile, and for the offer to serve him with all his forces. His Envoy was answered, That the King was sorry for what had happened, and that the present violence, like the mischiefs of a sudden inundation, must be endured at this time.

The Parliament being to meet the 24th of October, the King, a few days before, published a Proclamation, commanding all officers and soldiers serving in any of the armies of the late usurped powers, not having a constant habitation, to depart out of the Cities of London and Westminster, and not to return again or come within twenty miles, till after the 10th day of December next, and in the mean time to carry no sword, pistol, or any other arms. This was to show the Houses his care of their preservation.

The Parliament assembling, the King, after a short speech to both Houses, referred all to the Lord-Keeper. Probably, he durst not with his own mouth declare things so opposite to his designs, and which tended only to inflame the Parliament. He chose rather to have this done by the Keeper, who not being privy to the secrets of the Cabal, might speak with more assurance, as being persuaded of what he said. He represented therefore in his speech—

"That France and the States-General are powerfully arming by sea and land; are building new ships, and filling their magazines with all sorts of warlike provisions. That, since the beginning of the last Dutch war, France has so increased the number of her ships, that her strength by sea is thrice as much as it was before; and since the end of it, Holland has been very diligent also in augmenting her fleets. That in such a juncture common prudence requires, that his Majesty should make some suitable preparations: That he has therefore given order, for the fitting out fifty sail of the greatest ships against the spring, besides those which are to be for the security of the Merchants in the Mediterranean, as foreseeing, if he should not have a considerable fleet, temptation might be given to those who seem not now to intend it, to give us an affront, if not to do us mischief. To which may be added, That his Majesty, by the Leagues he hath made for the good of his Kingdoms, is obliged to a certain number of forces in case of invasion thereof; as also for the assistance of some of his neighbours, in case of invasion. And his Majesty would be in a very ill condition to perform his part of the Leagues, if, (while the clouds were gathering so thick about us,) he should, in hopes that the wind would disperse them, omit to provide against the storm." He then told them, "That his Majesty has made several leagues, as the Triple-alliance; another with the States-General; another with the Duke of Savoy; another with the King of Denmark; another with the King of Spain; not to mention the leagues formerly made with Sweden and Portugal, nor those treaties now depending between his Majesty and France, or between him and the States-General touching commerce; wherein his Majesty will have a singular regard to the honour of this nation, and also to the trade of it, which never was greater than now it is." He added, "That his Majesty finds by his accounts from the year '660 to the late war, the ordinary charge of the fleet communibus annis, came to about five hundred thousand pounds a year. If that particular alone takes up so much, the revenue will in no degree suffice to take off the debts due upon interest, much less give him a fund for setting out this fleet, which by common estimation cannot cost less than eight hundred thousand pounds."—He then intimated to them, "That his Majesty intended to put an end to this

(1) He found a way to bring them into a favorable disposition, namely, by distributing among them a hundred thousand Pistoles, which were sent to him for that purpose, by his Master the King of France. See Life of De Witt, Tom. 2. p. 344.

(2) The Duchess of Orleans brought over with her, and left in England, Madam Louise de Queroualle, as a Mistress for the King; probably, with design to retain and stretch him to the interest of France. She was afterwards created Duchess of Portsmouth, and is said to be still alive. See Edward, Tom. 3. p. 254.

(3) The Duke, her Husband, heard such things of her behaviour, that it was said, he ordered a great dose of salutarie to be given her in a glass of Succory water, of which she died a few hours after in great torment. And why, she was opened, her stomach was all ulcerated. Burnet, p. 301.

"meeting before Christmas, and therefore prayed them to take his Majesty's affairs into their speedy and affectionate consideration."

The House of Commons charmed with all these great preparations, immediately three bills, one to raise eight hundred thousand pounds by way of annuities (2); another to lay an additional Excise upon beer, ale, and other liquors for six years; a third for laying impositions upon Proceedings at Law for nine years. These three bills were to produce to the King two millions five hundred thousand pounds Sterling. But, before any bill was finished, the King adjourned the Parliament to the latter end of January.

The Prince of Orange came to London about the close of the year 1669 (3), to pay a visit to the King his uncle. The principal motive of his journey, was to demand of the King the repayment of money lent him by the Prince his Father in the time of his exile (4). He was graciously received, and after a stay of about three months returned into Holland.

Before his arrival, Sir William Temple was recalled from his embassy in Holland (5). He was not a proper instrument to be employed in the designs of the Cabal. Besides, the Court was disposed to a speedy rupture with the Dutch (6).

The Parliament meeting towards the latter end of January after a short recess, the Commons began with preparing a bill which made it death for any man maliciously to defame or disfigure another, to put out an eye, to cut off a nose or lip, &c. (7). This was owing to an attempt upon Sir John Coventry, a member of the Commons, in the street, in which his nose was slit. This fact was, by the King's order, committed to the Duke of Monmouth his natural son, and the Duke had employed some other persons, who, after the deed, retired to his house (8).

The 14th of February the King sent a message to the House of Commons to hasten the money-bills. But the House thought proper, before these bills were presented to the King, to address him concerning the growth of Popery, for which the concurrence of the Lords was obtained. As this address may serve to illustrate the History of this reign, it is not unnecessary to insert it entire.

May it please your most excellent Majesty,

"We your Majesty's most humble and loyal Subjects, the Lords and Commons in this present Parliament, being sensible of your Majesty's condescension to the Protestant Religion, both at home and abroad, hold our selves bound in conscience and duty, to represent to your Majesty the causes of the dangerous growth of Popery in your Majesty's Dominions, the ill consequence whereof we heartily desire may be prevented. And therefore what we humbly conceive to be some present Remedies for the said growing Evils, we have hereunto added in our most humble Petitions.

Causes of the Growth of Popery.

"1. THAT there are great numbers of Priests and Jesuits frequenting the cities of London and Westminster, and most of the counties of this Kingdom, more than formerly, seducing your Majesty's good Subjects.

"2. That there are several Chapels, and places used for saying of Mass, in the great towns, and many other parts of the Kingdom, besides those in Ambassadors houses, whither great numbers of your Majesty's Subjects constantly resort and repair without controul; and especially in the cities of London and Westminster, contrary to the laws established.

"3. That there are Fraternities or Convents of English Popish Priests and Jesuits at St. James's, and at the Cambe in Herefordshire, and other parts of the Kingdom; besides several Schools are kept in divers parts of the Kingdom for the corrupt educating of Youth in the principles of Popery.

"4. The common and publick felling of Popish Catechisms, and other seditious books, even in the time of Parliament.

"5. The general remissness of the Magistrates and other officers, Clerks of the Assize, and Clerks of the Peace, in not convicting of Papists according to law.

"6. That suspected Recusants are free from all offices chargeable and troublesome, and do enjoy the advantage of offices and places beneficial; executed either by themselves, or persons entrusted for them.

"7. That the advancement of Churches, and Presentations to Livings are disposed of by Popish Recusants, or by others entrusted by them as they direct; whereby most of those Livings and Benefices are filled with scandalous and unfit Ministers.

"8. That many persons take the liberty to send their children beyond the seas, to be educated in the Popish Religion; and that several young persons are sent beyond the seas, upon the notion of their better education, under tutors and guardians, who are not put to take the oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy, and usually corrupt the youth under their tuition into Popery.

"9. That there have been few Exchequer processess issued forth since the Act of Parliament against Popish Recusants convicted, though many have been certified thither.

"10. The great influences of Papists in Ireland (where do publicly appear Archbishops and Bishops reputed to be made so by the Pope, in opposition to those made under his Majesty's authority, according to the Religion established in England and Ireland) and the open exercise of Mass in Dublin, and other parts of that Kingdom, is further a great Cause of the present growth of Popery. That Peter Talbot, the reputed Archbishop of Dublin, was publicly consecrated so at Antwerp with great solemnity; from whence he came to London, where he exercised his function; and was all along, in his journey to Chester, treated with the character of His Grace by the Popish Recusants whom he visited: And at his landing at Dublin, was received with great solemnity by those of the Popish Religion there, where also he exercised his function publicly, great multitudes then flocking to him, and still continues to do the same. His present residence is within three miles of Dublin, at his Brother's Colonel Richard Talbot, who is now here soliciting your Majesty as publick Agent on the behalf of the Irish Papists of that Kingdom."

Remedies against these growing Mischiefs.

"We the Lords and Commons assembled in this present Parliament, do in all humility represent to your sacred Majesty in these our Petitions following:

"1. THAT your Majesty by your Proclamation would be most graciously pleased to command, that all Popish Priests and Jesuits do depart this realm, and all other your Majesty's Dominions, on or before a short day to be prefixed, at their perils; except only such foreign Priests as attend her Majesty's person by the contract of marriage, and Ambassadors according to the Law of Nations: And that all Judges, &c. do cause the Laws now in force against Popish Recusants convicted, to be put in due execution: And in the first place, for the speedy convicting such Popish Recusants, that all Judges and Justices aforesaid do strictly give the said laws in charge unto the Juries at all Assizes and Sessions, under the penalty of incurring your Majesty's highest displeasure.

"2. That your Majesty would be pleased to refrain and hinder the great concourse of your native subjects from hearing of Mass, and other exercises of the Romish Religion, in the houses of foreign Ambassadors or agents, and in all other chapels and places of this Kingdom.

"3. That your Majesty would be pleased, to take care, and cause, That no office or employment of publick authority, trust or command in civil or military affairs, be committed to, or continued in the hands of any person being a Popish Recusant, or justly reputed so to be.

"4. That your Majesty would be pleased to take notice of all Fraternities or Convents of English, and other Popish Priests, Jesuits or Friars, and Schools for the

"as shall be objected against them."

The King replied to this address, that he would do what was desired, but supposed, no person would wonder, if he made a difference between those Papists, that had newly changed their Religion, and those that were bred up in it, and had faithfully served him and his father in the late wars. A few days after, the King published a Proclamation, which ran much in the same stile with those that had been issued on this occasion, and was no better observed. From the beginning of the reign of James I., to the end of that of Charles II., the same method was constantly practised. Upon the instances of the Parliament to prevent the growth of Popery, these three Kings had never scrupled to grant whatever was desired, and in consequence to publish Proclamations; but there was a wide difference between the publication and the execution.

I shall observe here, that in the beginning of the civil wars, Charles I. positively denied, he had any Papists in his service. But Charles II. his son, in this forementioned answer, not only publicly owns it, but says also, that in consideration of the great services of the Papists, to his father and himself in the civil wars, he is obliged to give them marks of his favour.

This affair being ended, the Commons proceeded upon the three money bills, and as if these had not been sufficient to supply the King's extreme wants, they afterwards added a fourth, for impositions on foreign Commodities.
These Bills being sent up to the Lords, were debated in their House. On the second reading of the Subsidy-bill, the Lord Lucas rose up, and in presence of the King, who was then in the House, (where he frequently came without any formality) made a speech which was very disagreeable to his Majesty. I don't think it necessary to insert the whole speech, but however shall relate some passages, which will show what many thought, though few had the boldness of the Lord Lucas to speak it publicly.

He first complained, "That whereas, upon the King's restoration, it was the hopes of all good men, that the nation would be freed from the burthens they had been so long oppressed with, these burthens were heavier than ever, whilst their strength was diminished, and they were less able to support them,—that if the vast sums given were all employed for the King and Kingdom, it would not so much trouble them: But they could not without infinite regret of heart, see so great a part of the money pounded up in the purses of a few private men, who, in the time of his Majesty's most happy restoration, were worth very little or nothing, but were now purchasing lands, and kept their Coaches and six Horses, their Pages, and their Lacqueys; while, in the mean time, those that had faithfully served the King, were exposed to penury and want, and had scarce sufficient left to buy them bread.—But, supposing all the money given was employed for the use of his Majesty, and he was not cozened, as without doubt he is,
are there no bounds to, no moderation in, giving? Will it be said, that his Majesty will not be able to maintain the Triple-Alliance, without a plentiful supply, and we shall thereby run the hazard of being conquered: This may be a reason for giving something, but it is so far from being an argument for giving so much, that it may be clearly made out, That it is the direct and ready way to be conquered by a foreigner. And it may be the policy of the French King, by his often alarms of armies and fleets, to induce us to consume our treasure in vain preparations against him; and after he has by this means made us poor and weak enough, he may then come upon, and destroy us. It is not the giving a great deal, but the well managing the money given, that must keep us safe from our enemies.—Besides, what is this but ne moriari mori, to dye for fear of dying, and for fear of being conquered by a foreigner, to put ourselves in a condition almost as bad? Nay, in some respects, a great deal worse; for when we are under the power of the victor, we know we can fall no lower, and the certainties of our miseries are some sort of diminution of them: But in this wild way, we have no certainty at all; for if you give thus much to day, you may give as much more to morrow, and never leave giving, till we have given all that ever we have away.

—It is therefore necessary to be able to make some estimate of our selves: Would his Majesty be pleased to have a quarter of our estates? For my part he shall have it: Would he be pleased to have half? For my part, upon good occasions he shall have it: But then let us have some assurances of the quiet enjoyment of the remainder, and know what we have to trust to.
—The Commons have here sent up a Bill for the giving his Majesty the twentieth part of our estates, and I hear there are other Bills also preparing, which together will amount to little less than three millions of money, a prodigious sum! And such, that if your Lordships afford no relief, we must sink under the weight of it. I hope therefore, your Lordships will set some bounds to the over-liberal humour of the Commons. If you cannot deny or moderate a Bill for money, all your great estates are wholly at their disposal, and you have nothing that you can properly call your own, — Upon the whole matter, I most humbly propose, that you would be pleased to reduce the twelve pence in the pound, to eight pence."

This Speech, afterwards printed and published, was so offensive to the King and his Ministers, that it was ordered to be burnt by the common hangman. But however it made some impression upon the Lords, who sent the Bill to the Commons with amendments, that is, with some alterations (1). This occasioned a dispute between the two Houses, the Commons refusing to receive the amendments.
But in a conference the difference was ended, by the acquiescence of the Lords, to the reasons of the Commons. The two first money Bills, namely, the Subsidy-bill, and Money bills the additional tax upon beer, and other liquors, being re-passed, the King came to the House of Lords the 6th of March, and passed these two Acts, with another, for revesting the power of granting Wine-licences in his Majesty's heirs and successors, and for settling a revenue on his royal Highness in lieu thereof, which amounted to twenty-four thousand pounds a year (2).

There still remained two other Money-Bills, which had been sent to the Lords, one for Impositions on Proceedings at Law, and another for an additional Imposition upon several foreign Commodities. The first Bill passed the House of Lords without any difficulty. But the second occasioned a violent contest between the two Houses. The London merchants having presented a Petition to the Lords, in which they showed the disproportion of the Rates imposed upon certain commodities to be such as would utterly ruin the whole trade of these commodities, and bring an irreparable prejudice upon all the English Plantations, and consequently upon the Kingdom; Thereupon the Lords judg'd it necessary to make alterations in the Bill, and lower some of the rates, and then returned the Bill to the Commons. The Commons maintained, the Lords had no right to make any Amendments in Bills of Impositions and rates, and could only receive or reject them as they were sent, and the Lords asserted the contrary.
This dispute produced several conferences, in which the two Houses mutually communicated their reasons, answers, and replies. It would be too long to enter into the discussion of this difference, which, besides, would hardly be intelligible to those who have not a thorough knowledge of the constitution of English Parliaments. I shall only relate one circumstance, which may be understood by all,
and wherein consisted the essential part of the dispute.
The Commons maintained, that by a Fundamental Right, it belonged to their House (in exclusion of the Lords), to impose Rates upon merchandize. They meant by this Fundamental Right, a constant usage or custom, according to the principles of the Parliament, in the time of Charles I. The Lords, after the example of Charles I., demanded of the Commons, Where was the Charter or Contract to be found, by which the Lords divested themselves of this Right, and appropriated it to the Commons with an exclusion to themselves? To this the Commons replied by another question, Where was the Record by which the Commons submitted, that this Jurisdiction should be appropriated to the Lords in exclusion of themselves?
Wherever their Lordships should find the last Record, they would show the first endorsed upon the back of the

In short, the King perceiving the contest daily increas'd, came to the House of Peers, and after the royal assent given to an Act for impositions on Proceedings at Law, and some others, he prorogued the Parliament to the 16th of April, 1672. and afterwards by several Prorogations to the 4th of February 1672-3. So that this Prorogation continued a year and nine months.

Probably, every Reader will be surprized at the extreme liberality of the Commons to the King, and especially in this session. As to the former supplies, it may be said, they had some foundation true or false. But for the present supply, which was greater than any before, it was founded upon a contingency which had not even the least appearance. For it was upon a supposition, that France and the States-General, who were making great preparations, might invade England, if they found her unarm'd, though she was in peace with France, and in strict alliance with Holland. Besides, the States had hitherto made no extraordinary preparations, because they did not yet suspect, they should be attacked. And as to France, the King knew, he had nothing to fear from that quarter. Nevertheless, upon the King's bare propositions, supported by no probability, a sum of two millions and a half was granted him, which some even compute at three millions. Nothing is more proper to render probable what is asserted by many authors, that scarce a member, however inconsiderable, was without a pension from the King according to his credit in the House, and that these pensions were increased in proportion to the sums granted to the King. Thus much is certain, that afterwards upon an inquiry, some were found guilty of this collusion.

Before I proceed, it must not be forgot to speak of the death of Anne Hyde Duchess of York, daughter to the Earl of Clarendon, the late Chancellor. She died the 31st of March in the 34th year of her age, after an abjuration of the Protestant Religion during her long indisposition (1). From her marriage proceeded eight children, two of which only survived her, Mary and Anne, who were both Queens of England. The rest all dyed young (2).

The Duke of York was a Papist before the King's restoration, but I can't find at what time he changed his religion. It was a secret for some time, but had now been so divulged, that it was openly talked of in the Court and Country. At last, soon after the death of his Duchess he made a formal abjuration of the Protestant Religion before Father Simon: an English Jesuit, and from that time openly declared himself a Papist. His inducement, as 'tis said, to make publick profession of this Religion, was this. The King had, for some years, even before Clarendon's disgrace, entertained a secret design of divorcing his Queen, whom he had never loved. He had communicated this design to some of his confidants, but it was always opposed by the Earl of Clarendon, whether from the injustice of the thing, or for the sake of his daughter the Dutches of York, and her posterity. After the removal of that Minister, the King finding himself more free, persisted in his design, which, as it is affirmed, was encouraged by the Papists, and approved by the Court of Rome. One pretense for this divorce, was, that the Queen had been pre-engaged to another, who however was not named. It was also pretended, she was incapable of having children, though she had twice miscarried. But as these facts are very difficult to be proved, the King was assisted to find a more plausible pretense; which was, to lay snares to betray the Queen into such freedoms, as might be the ground of an accusation of adultery. But the King could not resolve to use a method so unjust, and dishonorable (3). Nevertheless the divorce was resolved, and as a pretence only was wanting, an effectual one would certainly have been found. The Priests and Jesuits who were continually about the Duke of York, had long pressed him to make open profession of the Roman Catholic Religion, but had not yet been able to succeed, because the Duke saw, it would make him forfeit the affection of most of the English. At last, upon the Duke of York's refusal they strenuously laboured the affair of the Divorce, and caused, as it is said, the Pope to promise his consent. When the business was thus far advanced, they intimated to the Duke of York, that they were able either to effect or hinder the King's divorce, and would undertake the latter, if he would make open profession of the Catholic Religion. This, as it is pretended, engaged him to declare himself a Papist, being apprehensive, that if the King should be divorced from his Queen, he would marry again, and have legitimate children. I relate these particulars as I found them in the Histories and Memoirs of those times, but I must warn the Reader, that the authors of them allege no other proof than their own testimony (4).

After the prorogation of the Parliament, the Cabal fought, with all possible ardor, means to execute their projects. These were, first, to render the King absolute, or in their language, a Great Prince: and under this article was comprized, the establishment of Popery, if not the entire destruction of the Protestant Religion. For there is no visible medium between these two things. I have already given the reason why the article of Religion is omitted by the King's adherents. The second project was to break the Triple-alliance. The third, to make war upon Holland, though it was difficult to invent any the least plausible pretence. To execute the two last, Mr. Henry Countrey, who had been Plenipotentiary at the treaty of Breda, was sent to Sweden, and Sir George Downing to the Hague. Temple, as I have said, was recalled, but to amuse the States, the King feigned to send for Temple only to be informed of some matters, and that he should immediately return. He was however still in London, and though the King had no design to send him back to Holland, yet to take away all suspicion from the Dutch of his intention to break with them, he had hitherto retuled his permission to Sir William to send for his wife and family. At last, he was openly recalled, and obtained leave for his wife and children to come over who were still at the Hague. The recalling of Temple, and sending of Downing in his place sufficiently discovered the King's intentions (5). The first was extremely beloved in Holland, as he had always behaved with integrity, and a concern for the common interests of both nations. The second had served for instrument to engage the King and the States in the late war, and was looked upon in Holland as a man of no honour, and a real incendiary. So that when the States heard, he was coming in the room of Temple, they no longer doubted of a rupture with England. Mean while Downing being arrived at the Hague, was not wanting in protestations, that the King his master was resolved to maintain the Triple-alliance, and if he was equipping a fleet, it was wholly owing to the great preparations of his neighbours, and particularly the King of France, of whom he had just cause to be jealous. But withal, he failed not to complain of the obnoxious of the Dutch, upon an affair of little importance, concerning the Colony of Surinam; adding some complaints of the English Merchants against the Dutch East-India Company. These were the two articles on which the King intended to found a rupture, but as he did not think them of sufficient weight, he projected to draw the States into a sort of insult upon him, which might give him a more plausible pretence for a war.

To this end, the King having granted Sir William Temple a yacht to bring over his Lady, the Admiralty gave express orders to the Captain to go in quest of the Dutch fleet, then at sea, and, if they refused to strike, to fire upon them. The Captain met with them as he was returning with the Ambassadors and her Children. When he saw, the fleet paid no regard to the King's yacht, he fired several shots at them. Mr. de Ghent, who commanded the fleet, surprized at this insult, sent a boat to the yacht to know the meaning of it. The Captain only answered, he had his instructions, and was bound to follow them. Upon this Mr. de Ghent went to the yacht on pretence of paying a compliment to the Ambassadors, which being performed, he talked with the Captain, and was answered as before. The Admiral replied, he had no orders from his Masters in that point, and did not know how the affair was agreed between his Majesty and the States; but though it were settled, the Captain could not pretend the fleet should strike to a yacht, which was but a pleasure-boat, and could not pass for a man of war. The Captain still persisted in saying, he only followed his orders. Nevertheless, the fleet did not fire a single shot at the yacht, and the Captain pursued his course, pleased that he had come off so well.

Besides the two millions and a half granted to the King by the Parliament, the King of France, if Abbot Primi

So the King thought only of war, though with all possible artifice he endeavoured to remove all suspicion of his having any such design. He spent the whole summer, and part of the autumn in progress through several parts of his Kingdom. The 28th of May he celebrated the feast of St. George in a very solemn manner at Windsor, and installed in the order of the Garter, the King of Sweden, and the Elector of Saxony, by their Proxies, and after them the young Duke of Albany. He also made a visit to the University of Cambridge, where he was magnificently entertained, and to several other places, which it is needless to mention. After his return, both their Majesties were invited to the Lord-Mayor's feast, on the 30th of October, where no cost was spared to display the grandeur and riches of the city of London.

Before I proceed to the transactions of the next year, I think myself obliged to take notice of an attempt, the most extraordinary that can possibly be devised by a private man. I mean that of Blood, a famous villain, robber, and assassin, who formed the design of stealing the Crown, Scepter, and Globe, which are kept in the Tower. With the assistance only of two or three more, he executed this design so dextrously and happily, that they were got out of the Tower with their booty, before they were seized. To give some account of Blood, I shall briefly say here, that the Duke of Ormond, when he was Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, having caused some of Blood's complices to be hanged, who intended to surprize the castle of Dublin, Blood swore, he would revenge their deaths. For this purpose, Blood followed the Duke of Ormond into England, when he was recalled, and watched him so well, that with the assistance of seven or eight persons on horseback, he stopped his Coach, in the night, as he was going to Clarendon house, where he lived, knocked down his footmen (2), and forced the Duke up behind one of the horsemen, in order to carry him to Tyburn, and hang him there, with a paper pinned on his breast, to show the cause of this execution. But the Duke forcibly throwing himself off the horse, with the villain who had tied the Duke fast to him, defeated the design, and the authors could never be discovered till after Blood's attempt upon the Crown.

This attempt was very extraordinary, but the King's conduct on that occasion was still more surprizing. For having a curiosity to examine Blood himself, he ordered him to be brought to Whitehall, and put several questions to him, which the villain answered with astonishing boldness, confessing all, and unconcernedly relating the circumstances of the thing. Then, the King asked him, whether he knew the authors of the attempt upon the Duke of Ormond? Blood confessed, it was himself. Not content with this, he told the King, he had been engaged in a design to kill him with a carbine, from out the reeds by the Thames-side above Botolph, where he often went to swim. But that when he had taken his stand in the reeds for that purpose, his heart was checked with an awe of Majesty, and did not only relent himself, but diverted his associates from the design. He also told the King, he was prepared to suffer death, as having deserved it; but must tell his Majesty, that he had hundreds of complices, who had bound themselves by a horrible oath, to revenge the death of any of the Fraternity, upon those who should bring them to justice; which would expose his Majesty and all his Ministers, to the daily fear and expectation of a massacre. But, on the contrary, if he spared the lives of a few persons, his own would be secure. The King was surprized, and probably, intimidated by Blood's discourse, and thought, doubtless, the attempt of this villain on the Duke of Ormond, to revenge the death of his complices, might be imitated, in revenge of his death, by his surviving comrades. However this be, the King sent the Earl of Arlington to the Duke of Ormond, to deliver him not to prosecute Blood, which the Duke could not refuse (3). Afterwards, he gave him his pardon, and not content with saving his life, conferred on him five hundred pounds a year in land in Ireland. From this time, Blood was continually at Court, and the King treated him with that freedom and familiarity, that many persons applied to him for favours from the King. This gave occasion to the King's enemies to say, that he kept this villain about him, to intimidate those who should dare to offend him in things which were not punishable by law, as had been practised in the case of Sir John Coventry, for some raileries upon him in the House of Commons. As for Edwards, the Keeper of the Crown, a man fourscore years old, who had done his utmost, tho' in vain, to hinder the theft, and had received so many wounds, that he was left for dead, the King contented himself with assigning him a reward of two hundred pounds, the payment of which was so long delayed, that the poor man died before he received it (4).

In the course of this year died two famous Generals, distinguished by their bravery and experience in the civil wars. The first was the Lord Fairfax, the Generalissimo, and the other Edward Montague Earl of Manchester. I shall say no more of them, because they have been sufficiently described in the reign of Charles I. I shall only add, that both were very serviceable in the King's restoration (5).

The league against Holland, much like that of Cambray against the Commonwealth of Venice, was still kept so secret, that the States could only suspect it, without any certainty. The design of the Allies was to begin with the ruin of the Dutch, before declaration of war, and then to attack them altogether, at the same time, and in different places. The King of France, the Elector of Cologne, and the Bishop of Munster, were to invade them by land, and the English and French fleets jointly to attack them by sea. This was the project, but it met with an unforeseen difficulty. Though Charles had received Two Millions, Five Hundred Thousand Pounds from the Parliament, and Seven Hundred Thousand Pounds from the King of France, he was still in want. Indeed, he had applied part of the money received, to the equipment of his fleet, which could not amount to half, and it was difficult to conceive, what was become of the rest. However this be, he signified to his Ministers, that he could not begin the war without fifteen hundred thousand pounds, and as he could not apply to the Parliament, which was prorogued, he promised the Treasurer's staff, to the person who should invent the means of raising that sum. Sir Thomas Clifford proved the most happy and ingenious. He went to the King, and told him, that by shutting up the Exchequer he would be sure of that sum. The King readily understood this advice, and resolving to follow it, performed his promise, and made Clifford Lord-Treasurer. Some however ascribe this project to the Lord Shaftesbury, and say, that Clifford having actually drawn it from him, gloried in it to the King (6).

To understand this method, (which though plain to English readers, is not so to foreigners,) it is to be observed, that at the Exchequer are received, by direction from the Lord-Treasurer, all the sums destined to publick uses, and the interests of the money borrowed upon Parliamentary Funds, which commonly cannot be raised under several months, or even years. So, when the King has a mind

(1) He was promised six millions of Livres, besides three hundred thousand Crowns a month, or three hundred and fifty thousand pounds Sterling a year, during his life. Life of Le Wit, Tom. 2. p. 346. Duport, p. 304.

(2) Rapin, by mistake says, he killed the Coachman and Footmen.

(3) The Duke answered, "That the King should see, he valued his life as little, as his Majesty did his Crown." Edwards, Tom. 3. p. 259.

(4) Edwards had a Grant of two hundred pounds for himself, and one hundred for his Son. Both, by the delay of payment, were obliged to sell their order for half the money, and the old man lived not long to enjoy the remainder. The manner of Blood's stealing the Crown was thus: He gave to the Treasurer in a Clergyman's habit, with a woman who he called his wife, and who, he pretended, wanted to see the Crown; and having seen it, she refused to be taken with a quail, and desired Mr. Edwards, the Keeper of the Crown, to lend for some Spirit, who immediately carried his Wife to Bethlem, of which she drank, and being invited to rest herself on a bed, she did so, and soon recovered. At their departure, they were very thankful for this civility. Three days after, Mr. Edwards with a present of Gloves from his Wife, and having thus begun an acquaintance, he improves it by frequent visits. At last, he tells Mr. Edwards, that he had a mind to make a match between a Nephew of his, and Mr. Edwards's Daughter, who ch. Nephew, he is, had three hundred pounds a year. Accordingly, a day was appointed for the young couple to see one another. Blood comes with three men, armed with rapier blades in their coats, and every one a dagger, and a pair of pocket pistols. One of the fellows stays at the door, and the others go in. Blood told Mr. Edwards, he would not go up stairs till his Wife came down, and desired him, in the mean time, to show his friends the Crown, to pass away the time. As soon as they were in the room, and the door shut as usual, they immediately gagged the old man, and knocked him down for endeavouring to make a noise. One of the companions put the Glove in his breeches, Blood kept the Crown under his gown, and the third was filing the Scepter. (being too long to manage) when their companions without gave them notice, that young Mr. Edwards was just come home, and gone up stairs, upon which they all made off with the Crown and Glove. But old Edwards getting up and making a noise, they were pursued and taken, as they were making to their hies, which waited at the Iron Gate in St. Kildon's. Blood, though he saw himself a prisoner, had the impudence to struggle for the Crown. Sirge's Contin. of Stow's Survey, Tom. 1. p. 92. Edwards.

(5) This year also died William Seymour Duke of Somerset; and the famous Critic, Meric Casaubon, Prebend of Canterbury. Edwards.

(6) The substance of the story, as it is told by Mr. Edwards, from a Manuscript of Sir Joseph Jekyll's, is this:—The King, upon pressing necessities, promised the white staff to any one of his Ministers, who could put him in a way to raise fifteen hundred thousand pounds, without applying to his Parliament. The next day Lord Ashley told Sir Thomas Clifford, That there was a way to do this; but that it was dangerous, and might in its consequences inflame both Parliament and People. Sir Thomas, impatient to know the secret, held the Lord Ashley with violence, and having drunk him to a proper height, led him privately to the subject of the King's indignity. Lord Ashley, weary and unguarded, dropped the important secret of shutting up the Exchequer. Sir Thomas took the hint, let Ashley as soon as he could, went the same night to Whitehall, and attending till the King rose, demanded the white staff. The King renewed his promise, if the money could be found, and then Sir Thomas disclosed the secret. The project was put in execution, and Clifford advanced to be Treasurer, and created a Peer. Ashley was touched, and said, That Clifford had ploughed with his Heifer. However, to satisfy him, he was sent made Earl of Shaftesbury, and so on after Lord Chancellor of England. Tom. 3. p. 288.

1671. to have all at once, the money that has been granted him, he borrows it of private persons at a large interest, and assigns them payment upon the Exchequer, which applies to this use the money, raised from the granted Funds, as it comes in. Moreover, at the time I am speaking of, all the monied-men in London, not to keep large sums in their houses, put their money into the hands of Bankers and Goldsmiths, without interest. And when they wanted any part, they drew upon their Goldsmiths or Bankers, who immediately paid it. Now, as it was morally impossible, that all the private persons who had money at a Banker's, should want it all at once, those who had the money in their hands kept only a sum sufficient to answer the usual demands, and lent the rest to the King at a large interest, upon the Parliamentary Funds. So, in shutting up the Exchequer, he received all the money which came into it (1), without paying any thing of what he owed. But at the same time, the persons who had put their money into the hands of the Bankers and Goldsmiths, were entirely ruined, since it was not in their power to dispose of their capital; especially, as the Bankers refused even to pay the Notes drawn daily upon them, on pretence, that they received nothing from the Exchequer. This caused an extreme conflagration in London, but the King and his Ministers pursued their measures, and, deaf to the complaints of so many ruined families, kept the Exchequer shut up one year, and, at the expiration of that term, it continued shut up by a new order, some months longer. But the whole misfortune did not consist in twelve or eighteen months expectation. It is easy to imagine, the King having received all the money which came into the Exchequer during that time, the sums which were brought in, when it was opened, were not sufficient to discharge the arrears of these eighteen months. This is the true state of the affair, which caused the English to exclaim so loudly against the King and the Cabal. But the hopes the Cabal then had to render the King absolute, made them very easy under the complaints and reproaches of the people.

1671-2. But Charles had in his thoughts a project which would furnish him with still more considerable sums. This was to surprize the Dutch fleet returning from Smyrna richly laden (2), before any declaration of war. He had practised the same thing the last year, with regard to the Bourdeaux fleet, and received a great advantage from it. This fleet being much richer, inspired him with great expectations. To this end he put to sea thirty-six men of war (3) under the command of Holms, who had orders to cruise in the Channel, and intercept this fleet. Holms being informed that the Dutch fleet approached, divided his own into three squadrons. That of Holland consisted of seventy-two sail of merchant-ships, many of which had no guns, under the Convoy of five men of war, commanded by experienced officers. These drew up the merchant-men in three squadrons, in good order, and put themselves between them and the English fleet, after having enjoined them to pursue their course without breaking their line. Holms attacked this fleet the 13th of March (4), and fought the whole day without gaining the least advantage. The next day at nine in the morning the fight was renewed, and lasted all the day, though on the side of the Dutch, Captain De Haet, who acted as Admiral, had been killed about noon. On the side of the English the Vice-Admiral's ship was disabled. On the morning, at eight in the morning, Holms, who had been reinforced by some frigates, renewed the engagement, and at last took one man of war, the Captain and most of the sailors being slain, and three merchant ships (5) which were brought into the Thames. This was all the advantage the English received from an action, which highly reflected on the King. It was carefully published at London, that this engagement was but an effect of chance, because the Dutch refused to strike. Though every one openly spoke against so dishonorable an action, the King was not affected with the sentiments of the vulgar, and instead of repairing the injury done to the States, in seizing their ships before the war was declared, sent out a squadron to meet four Dutch India men, which were immediately taken and condemned. At the same time, he ordered all the Dutch ships in his ports to be seized, tho by an express article of the Treaty of Breda, no merchant ships were to be taken till six months after a declaration of war. The States, seduced by so ill an example, seized also the English ships. But, upon the strong representation of some of the deputies, how much the honour of Princes and States was wounded by these depredations, and that the King of England's acting against the faith of treaties, was not a sufficient reason to engage the States to imitate so blameable a conduct, the English ships were discharged and sent into England. The King could not then help releasing some of the Dutch ships, but did not restore all.

One of the branches of the project formed by the Cabal was, as I said, to render the King absolute (6), and under this branch was comprized the extirpation of the Protestant, or at least the introduction of the Popish Religion, though Father Orleans, and the writers on the King's side, when speaking of this project, say nothing of this article. Father Orleans however could not forbear owning it in the course of his History. I shall transcribe a passage from him, which, though extremely softened with respect to the end, clearly shows, it was one of the branches of the project. After speaking of what had passed concerning the Papists and other Non-conformists, he adds, "The King, who was no good Christian in his actions, though a Catholic in his heart, did all that could be expected from his indolent temper, to preserve the common liberty, that the Catholics might partake of it. But the Church of England prevailed, and Chancellor Hyde was so warm upon this occasion, that the King was obliged to yield rather to his importunities than his reasons. It was therefore the re-establishment of this liberty of conscience, that the Lord Ashley believed necessary to the execution of the projected design. He communicated his thoughts to his colleagues of the Cabal, who were of the same opinion, not only on account of the reason he alleged, which was, the gaining of the Non-conformists who were justly feared, but also upon another, which he readily approved, namely, the favouring of the Catholics, whom most of them loved, and the rest esteemed. Arlington and Clifford were secretly Catholics, and both died in the communion of the Church. Buckingham had no occasion to be converted, could he only have prevailed with himself as to libertinism. Ashley was not averse to the Catholic Religion, till interest and malice threw him into the contrary party. It will easily be conceived, that the King readily consented to it, since he was a Catholic, and continued so to his death, though policy caused him to pretend the contrary. As for the Duke of York, he supported the design with all his power. All the difficulty lay in the extent of this liberty, and the two Kings of France and England, acting in concert, debated this affair in the negotiation of their treaty. Several proposals were made, some more, some less, advantageous to the Catholics. France was for the most moderate, safest and most reasonable methods. At last, it was agreed, that Charles should grant liberty of conscience to all his Subjects in general."

It appears from hence, that Religion was concerned in the projects of the Cabal. But probably, some were for having the progress of the Popish Religion subservient to render the King absolute, and others were for rendering the King absolute to favour the progress of Popery. Wherefore, these two articles were never separated, nor indeed could be, since they entirely depended on each other. The King plainly showed it, when he published his declaration for Liberty of Conscience, since he could not grant this liberty without assuming a power to abrogate Acts of Parliament, or at least suspend the execution thereof so long as he pleased. This declaration, dated the 15th of March 1672, consisted of various articles, of which I shall here give the substance:

1. His Majesty publishes it, in virtue of his supreme power in ecclesiastical matters, which is a right inherent in his person, and declared to be so by several Acts of Parliament.
2. He declares his express resolution to be, that the Church of England be preserved and remain entire in her doctrine, discipline, and government, as now it stands established by law.
3. That no person shall be capable of holding any Ecclesiastical benefice or preferment of any kind, who is not exactly conformable.

4. That the execution of all penal laws in matters ecclesiastical against whatsoever sort of Non-conformists or Recusants, be immediately suspended.

5. He declares, that he will from time to time allow a sufficient number of places, as shall be desired, in all parts of his Kingdom, for the use of such as do not conform to the Church of England, to meet and assemble in, in order to their public worship and devotion.

6. That none of his subjects do presume to meet in any place, until such place be allowed, and the teacher of that congregation be approved by him.

7. He declares, that this indulgence as to the allowance of publick places of worship, and approbation of teachers, shall extend to all sorts of Non-conformists and Recusants, except the Recusants of the Roman Catholic Religion, to whom he will no ways allow publick places of worship, but only indulge them their share in the common exemption from the executing the penal laws, and the exercise of their worship in their private houses only (1).

Two days after, the King published his declaration of war against the States, dated the 17th of March (2). This declaration, as that of the former war, was founded upon generals, and affected pretences. This is always the case when war is first justified, and reasons or pretences are afterwards sought. (3) The King historically introduced his "just reasons to begin the first war upon the States," though it was ended by the treaty of Breda. He added, "that peace was no sooner concluded than violated by the States, in not sending commissioners to London to settle the trade of the two nations in the East Indies: and when he sent over his ambassador to put them in mind of it, he could not in three years get any satisfaction from them in the material points, nor a forbearance of the wrongs which his subjects received in those parts."

It is easy to see to what great discussions these generals are liable.

2. He said, that having restored Surinam to them, "they were obliged by the treaty of Breda to permit the English in that Colony to remove with their effects, but that this permission was refused."

The Dutch maintained on the contrary, that the English inhabitants of Surinam remained there upon their own choice.

3. He complained of abusive Pictures and Medals dispersed over Holland, reflecting on his honour.

The States said, they knew but of one abusive Medal, the stamp of which they had ordered to be broke.

4. He complained, that in Holland his right of the Flag had been represented as ridicule.

It is easy to perceive whether his position concerning the yacht which brought over the Lady Temple was just or not.

This was the substance of what was most plausibly alleged for undertaking the war. He ended with this declaration.—"And whereas we are engaged by a treaty to support the peace made at Aix-la-Chapelle, we do finally declare, that notwithstanding the prosecution of this war, we will maintain the true intent and scope of the said treaty; and that in all the alliances which we have or shall make in the progress of this war, we have and will take care, to preserve the ends thereof inviolable, unless provoked to the contrary. He took but little care of his honour, in pretending to show, that his design in breaking with the States and uniting with France, was, to maintain the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle. But there was nothing so absurd though the Cabal did not think they could impose on the publick, wherein they were much mistaken, as will appear in the sequel.

This war was so contrary to the interests of England and all Europe, the defence of which Charles had so often boasted to undertake by means of the Triple-league, it was so directly opposite to justice, equity, faith, and the religion of the English, publicly professed by the King, that no man could believe it till the blow was struck. The Hollanders imagined, he only intended to exact some money from them, or at most, to intimidate them in order to oblige them to restore the Prince of Orange his nephew to the posts enjoyed by his ancestors. France her self could hardly believe, but that he intended to deceive her, till he had fallen upon the Smyrna fleet. But all were mistaken in ascribing to the King any affection for his people. His sole aim was to render himself absolute, in order to enjoy all the riches of England without controul, and without any obligations to his Parliament. The Duke of York, his presumptive heir, found his account in so fine a scheme, and, besides, thought of establishing his Religion for which he was excessively zealous. As for the Cabal, they were men entirely destitute of all principles of honour, justice, or religion, each of whom was solely intent upon making his fortune by sacrificing the interest of the publick. For it cannot be thought, that persons of their abilities could be ignorant, that what they were acting was directly contrary to the interests of England. They did not believe, they could execute their grand project without a strict alliance with the King of France, who actually persuaded them, that after the republick of Holland should be destroyed, the two Crowns would jointly labour to render the King absolute in England, and establish the Catholic Religion. But they had too much cause afterwards to see that they were deceived by France. Indeed it was not Lewis's interest to render the King of England absolute in his dominions, but rather to sow and cherish division between the King and his Subjects, in which, by seeming to enter into the views of the Cabal, he was but too successful. But there occurred in the execution of the project an obstacle, which the secret counsellors should have foreseen, and perhaps did foresee without being able to help it. This was the King's immense profuseness, which was the reason that all the sums received from France and the Parliament were insufficient to support the war two years, so that he was obliged to have recourse to the Parliament, who at last broke measures so well-concerted. On the other hand, this project alarming all Europe, the States found protectors who rendered the execution very difficult.

The same day that the declaration of war against the States was published at London, the like was published at Paris, founded upon no juster grounds. For the King of France gave no other reason of the war, than his displeasure at the conduct of the States. This union between France and England (which then appeared openly, whatever care had been hitherto taken to conceal it) showed the ridiculousness of what the King ordered the Lord-Keeper to tell the Parliament, That common prudence required, that his Majesty should make suitable preparations, when France had such forces both at land and sea. It appeared by this, that the King scrupled not to tell his Parliament the contrary of what he thought, which could not but make him lose the confidence of his people, as it happened accordingly.

About a month after, the Bishop of Munster also proclaimed war against the Dutch, on pretence, that they had endeavoured to corrupt the Governors or his frontier-places. As for the Elector of Cologne, he had already introduced French troops into his dominions, to provide, as he pretended, for his security. But though he protested an intention to observe an exact neutrality, the States were perfectly informed of his treaty with France. Thus these four Princes were united for the utter destruction of the Republick of the United-Provinces, without mentioning several Princes of Germany engaged by the King of France to stand neutral, that they might not assist Holland.

The States having some time foreseen this impending storm, had endeavoured to divert it, by giving the King of England all the satisfaction he could reasonably expect. They had offered to agree to whatever he desired concerning the Flag, and besides, they had on the 24th of February made the Prince of Orange Captain-General, and Admiral, though he was then but twenty-two years of age. They believed, this would suffice to content the King his uncle, for they were yet ignorant that his design was to overturn their Republick, without any regard to the interests of the Prince of Orange. This change in favour of the young Prince, would, perhaps, have never been made, had it not been deemed necessary to appease the King of England. There were three parties in Holland: That of the Pensionary, (which was the more powerful, and called the Louvoistin party, from the name of the castle where the Prince's father had confined the leading men of this faction;) That of the Prince of Orange; and a third which affected a neutrality, and had hitherto joined with neither of the two first, but on this occasion believed it necessary to join with the second, in hopes of satisfying the King of England. The States therefore sent a deputation to the Prince, to offer him the dignities of Captain General, and Admiral, and the Pensionary de Wit, to his mortification, was appointed head of this deputation. Thus the Prince of Orange saw himself Captain-general, but without an army, or at least, with an army so inconsiderable, and filled for the most part with unexperienced officers, chosen more for their attachment to the Pensionary, than their personal merit.

I shall not relate the progress of the King of France, and his two allies, the Bishop of Munster, and the Elector of

The French King, Louis XIV. March 28. Balaige. Kennet. p. 315. Edward. M. Coke.

The Bishop of Munster declares war against the Dutch. The Elector of Cologne sends troops into his dominions. The States of France.

Offer made by the King of England to the States of the United-Provinces. The Prince of Orange made Captain-General and Admiral.

Progress of the King of France, and his two allies, the Bishop of Munster, and the Elector of Cologne.

1672. drowning of Holland put a stop to his conquests, marched his army into Flanders, leaving the Duke of Luxemburgh at Utrecht, and came to Paris in August, attended by the Duke of Monmouth, who, in pursuance of Charles's engagement in their treaty, had brought him at the opening of the campaign, six thousand effective men.

I shall not relate the particulars of the war carried on by land during the rest of the campaign, because England had no part in it, and, besides, it is fully described by the Histories of those times. It is sufficient for the Reader to know in general, that though the States had some success against the Bishop of Münster, their affairs were reduced to a wretched condition, and the neighbourhood of the Duke of Luxemburgh scarce gave them time to breathe. Their whole refuge lay in the alliances they expected to make with the Emperor, Spain, and some Princes of Germany, and in the hopes that the English Parliament which was to meet, according to the prorogation the 30th of October, would see the interest of England, and of all Europe. But the King deprived them of this last resource, by proroguing the Parliament to February.

The 4th of December the King declared in Council, that he would raise more forces, and dispose of them in convenient quarters, to be employed on occasion. And for payment of them, he ordered that the Exchequer should continue till the 1st of May 1673, though he had positively promised it should be opened the beginning of the year. He published on this account, a Proclamation, in which it was said, "That notwithstanding his Majesty had not been wanting on his part, to comply with all honorable ways and means that might effect a peace, yet the continuance of those inevitable necessities which first obliged him to shut up the Exchequer, compelled him to continue to stop the payment of moneys till the 1st of May next: doubting not but that his loving Subjects would have such trust and confidence in his justice, that it would take away all apprehensions of their being in the least defrauded of their just dues."

The ways and means used by the King to effect a peace, consisted, in that his two Ambassadors at Utrecht were contented to demand in his name, a million of pounds sterling, for the expenses of the war; the compliment of the flag without any exception; a hundred thousand pounds yearly for the liberty of Fishing; the sovereignty of all that should remain of the United Provinces, for his nephew the Prince of Orange; a participation of the whole India trade; the town of Sluis, the Isles of Cadiz, Walcheren, Gorée, Poer; and lastly, an entire satisfaction to the King of France. It must have been great obstinacy in the States to find fault with such reasonable demands. Consequently the King could not in honour dispense with the continuation of the war, and the keeping the Exchequer shut to maintain it.

Sir John Trevor dying this year, Sir Henry Coventry, lately returned from Sweden, where he had successfully negotiated for the King, succeeded him in the office of Secretary of State.

Sir Orlando Bridgeman resigning the Great Seal, the new Earl of Shaftsbury was made Lord High-Chancellor (1). A few days after, the King performed his promise to Clifford, by making him Lord-Treasurer, so that all the great offices of the State were held by the Cabal, or by persons devoted to their interests. But that it may be seen, how the five Lords of the Cabal flattered the King, and one another, at the very time, the nation was most loudly exclaiming against the Government, I shall insert here part of a speech made by the Lord Shaftsbury, as Chancellor, to the Lord Clifford, when he tendered him the oath in Westminster-Hall, upon his admission to the office of Treasurer. After telling him the nature of his office, he added,—"My Lord, I may justly say you are in a place of the very first rank as to dignity, power, trust, and influence of affairs; a place that requires such a man as our great Master's wisdom hath found for it; from whose natural temper we may expect courage, quickness and resolution; from whose education, wisdom, and experience; and from whose extraction that noble and illustrious House of the Cliffords (2), an heroic mind, a large soul, and an unshaken fidelity to the Crown. My Lord, it is a great honour, much even beyond the place it self, that you are chosen to it by the King, who, without flattery, I may say, is as great a master in the knowledge of men and things, as this, or any other age hath produced: And let me say farther, it is not only your honour that you are chosen by him, but it is your safety too, that you have him to serve; with whom no subtle insinuations of any near him, nor the aspiring interest of a favourite, shall ever "prevail against those that serve him well. Nor can his servants fear to be sacrificed to the malice, fury, or mistake of a more swelling popular greatness: A Prince under whom the unfortunate fall gently: A Prince, in a word, that best of all mankind deserves the title of delicia humani generis. Let me end with this wish, or rather prophecy, That you may exceed all your predecessors in this place; the abilities and fidelity of the renowned Lord Burleigh; the sagacity, quickness, and great dispatch of his son the Lord Salisbury; and the uprightness, integrity, and wisdom of that great man that went last before you, the Earl of Southampton."

It will hereafter appear, that the Earl of Shaftsbury preserved not long the sentiments of esteem and admiration for the King, expressed in this speech.

Hitherto the Cabal had sailed with a prosperous gale on a very dangerous sea, famous for wrecks, without any opposition. But at last they were stopped in their course by a rock which it was not possible to avoid, I mean the Parliament. It was now almost two years since the Parliament was assembled, and as, in that interval, the King had taken some steps which instilled great fears into his Subjects, the new session was expected with the utmost impatience, in hopes, that the Parliament would apply proper remedies to the present evils, and find means to prevent those with which the Kingdom was still threatened. The Parliament therefore met the 4th of February, and chose a Speaker by the direction of the Court, Sir Edward Turner the last Speaker having been made Chief Baron of the Exchequer. The choice falling upon Sir Joh Charles, he desired to be excused; but the Lord Chancellor Shaftsbury told him, before the King and both Houses, that no excuses would be admitted. The conjuncture of times, (says he,) and the King's and Kingdom's affairs, require such a House of Commons, and such a Speaker. For, with reverence to the Holy Scripture, the King may on this occasion say, he that is not with me is against me: For he that doth not now put his hand and heart to support the King in the common cause of this Kingdom, can hardly ever hope for such another opportunity, or find a time to make satisfaction for the omission of this. Presently after, the King made the following speech to both Houses.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"I Am glad to see you here this day; I would have called you together sooner, but that I was willing to ease you and the country, till there was an absolute necessity. Since you were last here, I have been forced to a most important, necessary and expensive war; and I make no doubt, but you will give me suitable and effectual assistance to go through with it. I refer you to my Declaration for the causes, and indeed the necessity of this war; and shall now only tell you, that I might have digested the indignities to my own person, rather than have brought it to this extremity, if the interest as well as the honour of the whole Kingdom had not been at stake: And if I had omitted this conjuncture, perhaps I had not again ever met with the like advantage. You will find, that the last supply you gave me, did not answer the expectation for the end you gave it, the payment of my debts. Therefore I must in the next place recommend them again to your especial care."

"Some few days before I declared the war, I put forth my Declaration for Indulgence to Dissenters, and have hitherto found a good effect of it, by securing peace at home, when I had war abroad. There is one part in it that hath been subject to misconstruction, which is that concerning the Papists; as if more liberty were granted to them, than to the other Recusants; when it is plain, there is less: For the others have publick places allowed them, and I never intended that they should have any, but only have the freedom of their Religion in their own houses, without any concurrence of others. And I could not grant them less than this, when I had extended so much more grace to others, most of them having been loyal, and in the service of me, and of the King my father: And in the whole course of this indulgence, I do not intend, that it shall any ways prejudice the Church, but I will support its rights, and it in its full power. Having said this, I shall take it very ill to receive contradiction in what I have done. And I will deal plainly with you, I am resolved to stick to my declaration. There is one jealousy more that is maliciously spread abroad, and yet so weak and frivolous, that I once thought it not of moment enough to mention; but it may have gotten some ground with some well-minded people, and that is, That the forces I have raised in this war, were designed to controul Law and Pro-

" party: I wish I had more forces the last summer, the want of them convinces me, I must raise more against this next spring; and I do not doubt but you will consider the charge of them in your supplies. I will conclude with this assurance to you, That I will preserve the true Reformed Protestant Religion, and the Church, as it is now established in this Kingdom; and that no man's Property or Liberty shall ever be invaded. I leave the rest to the Chancellor."

The Speech afterwards spoke by the Chancellor is so remarkable, that it well deserves a place in this History.

" My Lords, and you Knights, Citizens, and Burgeses of the House of Commons.

" The King hath spoke so fully, so excellently well, and so like himself, that you are not to expect much from me. There is not a word in his speech that hath not its full weight: And I dare with assurance say, will have its effect with you. His Majesty had called you sooner, and his affairs required it, but that he was resolved to give you all the ease and vacancy to your own private concerns; and the people as much respite from payments and taxes, as the necessity of his business, or their preservation, would permit. And yet (which I cannot but here mention to you) by the crafty insinuations of some ill-affected persons, there have been spread strange and desperate rumours, which your meeting together this day, hath sufficiently proved both malicious, and false. His Majesty hath told you, that he is now engaged in an important, very expensive, and indeed, a war absolutely necessary and unavoidable. He hath referred you to his Declaration, where you will find the personal indignities by Pictures and Medals, and other public affronts, his Majesty hath received from the States, their breach of Treaties, both in the Surinam, and East-India businesses: And at last they came to that height of insolence, as to deny the honour and right of the Flag, though an undoubted jewel of this Crown, never to be parted with, and by them particularly owned in the late treaty of Breda, and never contested in any age. And whilst the King first long expected, and then solemnly demanded satisfaction, they disputed his title to it, in all the Courts of Christendom, and made great offers to the French King, if he would stand by them against us. But the most Christian King too well remembered, what they did at Munster, contrary to so many treaties and solemn engagements; and how dangerous a neighbour they were to all crowned heads. The King and his Ministers had here a hard time, and lay every day under new obloquies. Sometimes they were represented as selling all to France for money to make this war: Portsmouth, Plymouth, and Hull, were to be given into the French hands for caution. The next day news came, that France and Holland were agreed. Then the obloquy was turned from Treachery to Folly: The Ministers are now fools, that some days before were villains. And indeed the Coffee-houses were not to be blamed for their last apprehensions; since if that conjunction had not taken effect, then England had been in a far worse case than it now is, and the war had been turned upon us. But both Kings knowing their interests, resolved to join against them, who were the common enemies to all Monarchies, and I may say especially to ours, their only competitor for Trade and Power at Sea; and who only stand in their way, to an Universal Empire, as great as Rome. This the States understood so well, and had swallowed so deep, that under all their present distress and danger, they are so intoxicated with that vast Ambition, that they slight a Treaty, and refuse a Cessation. All this, you, and the whole nation saw, before the last war; but it could not then be so well timed, or our alliances so well made. But you judged aright, That at any rate, DELENDA EST CARTHAGO, That Government was to be brought down. And therefore the King may well say to you, it is your war! He took his measures from you; and they were just and right ones: And he expects a suitable assistance to so necessary and expensive an action; which he has hitherto maintained at his own charge, and was unwilling either to trouble you, or burden the country, until it came to an inevitable necessity. And his Majesty commands me to tell you, that unless it be a certain sum, and speedily raised, it can never answer the occasion.

" My Lords and Gentlemen, Reputation is the great support of war or peace. This war had never begun, nor had the States ever slighted the Kings, or ever refused him satisfaction; neither had this war continued to this day, or subsisted now, but that the States were deceived in their measures, and apprehended his Majesty in that great want of money, that he must sit down under any affronts, and was not able to begin or carry " on a war. Nay, at this day the States support themselves amongst their people by this only fiction, That they are assured of the tender of England, and of the Parliament, and that you will not supply the King with war; and that if they can hold out till your meeting, they will have new life, and take new measures. There are lately taken two of their principal agents, with their credentials and instructions to this purpose, who are now in the Tower, and shall be proceeded against according to the Law of Nations. But the King is sufficiently assured of his people; knows you better; and can never doubt his Parliament. This had not been mentioned, but to shew you of what importance the Frankness and Seasonableness of this supply is, as well as the Fulness of it. Let me say, the King has brought the States to that condition, that your hearty conjunction at this time in supplying his Majesty, will make them never more formidable to Kings, or dangerous to England. And if after this you suffer them to get up, let this be remembered, The States of Holland are England's eternal enemies both by INTEREST and INCLINATION. In the next place, to the supply for the carrying on of the war, his Majesty recommends to the taking care of his debts. What you gave the last session did not answer your own expectation. Besides, another considerable aid you designed his Majesty, was unfortunately lost in the birth; so that the King was forced for the carrying on his affairs, much against his will, to put a stop to the payments out of the Exchequer. He saw the pressures upon himself, and growing inconveniences to his people by great interest; and the difference through all his businesses between receipts and orders. This gave the King the necessity of that proceeding; to make use of his own revenue, which hath been of so great effect in this war. But though he hath put a stop to the trade and gain of the Bankers, yet he would be unwilling to ruin them, and oppress so many families as are concerned in those debts: Besides, it were too disproportionate a burden upon many of his good subjects. But neither the Bankers, nor they, have reason to complain, if you now take them into your care, and they have paid them what was due to them, when the stop was made, with six per Cent. interest from that time. The King is very much concerned both in honour and interest, to see this done, and yet he desires you not to mix time in it; but that it may have only the second place, and that you will first settle what you intend about the supply.

" His Majesty has so fully vindicated his Declaration from that calumny concerning the Papists, that no reasonable scruple can be made by any good man. He has sufficiently justified it by the time it was published in, and the effects he hath had from it; and might have done it more from the agreeableness of it, to his own natural disposition, which no good Englishman can wish other than it is. He loves not blood, or rigorous severities; but where mild or gentle ways may be used by a wise Prince, he is certain to chuse them. The Church of England, and all good Protestants, have reason to rejoice in such a Head, and such a Defender. His Majesty doth declare his care and concerns for the Church, and will maintain them in all their Rights and Privileges, equal, if not beyond any of his predecessors. He was born and bred up in it: It was that his father died for: We all know how great temptations and offers he resisted abroad, when he was in his lowest condition; and he thinks it the honour of his reign, That he hath been the restorer of the Church. It is that he will ever maintain, and hopes to leave to posterity in greater lustre, and upon surer grounds, than our ancestors ever saw it. But his Majesty is not convinced, that violent ways are the interest of Religion, or the Church. There is one thing more, that I am commanded to speak to you of, which is the jealousy that hath been foolishly spread abroad, of the forces the King has raised in this war. Wherein the King hath opened himself freely to you, and confessed the fault on the other hand. For if this last summer had not proved a miracle of storms and tempests, such as secured their East India fleet, and protected their Sea-coasts from a descent, nothing but the true reason, Want of Money, could have justified the defect in the number of our forces. It is that his Majesty is provided for against the next spring, having given out orders for the raising of seven or eight regiments more of Foot, under the command of persons of the greatest fortunes and quality. And I am earnestly to recommend to you, that in your supplies, you will take into your consideration, this necessary addition of charge.

" And after his Majesty's conclusion of his Speech, let me conclude, nay, let us all conclude with blessing God, and the King! Let us bless God, that he hath given us such a King, to be the repeller of our breaches, both in Church 1723. " Church and State; and the restorer of our paths to dwell

" in: That in the midst of war and misery, which rages
" in our neighbour countries, our garners are full, and " there is no complaining in our streets; and a man can " hardly know that there is a war. Let us bless God, " that he hath given this King signally the hearts of his " people, and most particularly of his Parliament, who in " their affection and loyalty to their Prince, have exceeded
" all their predecessors: A Parliament, with whom the " King hath many years lived with all the cares of a " happy marriage. Has the King had a concern? You " have wedded it. Has his Majesty wanted supplies? You " have readily, cheerfully, and fully provided for them.
" You have relied upon the wisdom and conduct of his Ma" jesty in all his affairs; so that you have never attempted " to exceed your bounds, or to impose upon him: Whilst " the King, on the other hand, hath made your Coun" sels the foundation of all his proceedings; and hath been " so tender of you, that he hath upon his own Revenue
" and Credit, endeavoured to support even foreign wars,
" that he might be less uneasy to you, or burthen some to " his people. And let me say, That though this marriage " be according to Moses's law, where the husband can " give a bill of divorce, put her away, and take another;
" yet I can assure you, it is as impossible for the King to part
" with this Parliament, as it is for you to depart from that " loyalty, affection, and dutiful behaviour, you have hi" therto shewn towards him. Let us bless the King for " taking away all our fears, and leaving no room for jea" lousies; and for those assurances and promises he hath " made us. Let us bless God and the King, that our Re" ligion is safe; that the Church of England is the care of " our Prince; that Parliaments are safe; and that our " Properties and Liberties are safe. What more hath a " good Englishman to ask? But that this King may long " reign, and this Triple-Alliance of King, Parliament,
" and People, may ever be dissolved."

Remark upon this Speech.

I shall make no reflections on this Speech, because it would lead me too far; and besides, I imagine every disinterested reader can see the falsity of most of the things related, and the gross artifice wherewith they are vented.
I shall only observe, that this speech was spoke by a member, or rather by the head of the Cabal, who perfectly knew the King's secret intentions. The Earl of Shaftsbury therefore must have had a forehead of brass to pronounce such a speech before so august an assembly. But very likely, this was only for form sake, and the Cabal believed themselves so secure, that the Parliament itself would not dare to seem to know their artifices. But they were mistaken, and even the House of Commons had already given some indications of vigour, before the King and Chancellor had delivered their Speeches. Presently after their meeting, they loudly complained of Writs issued out by the Lord Chancellor, for electing and returning of persons to sit in their House, in the room of such as were dead, or removed. And by the way, all the members elected by virtue of these Writs, were the Chancellor's creatures.
This complaint caused the King immediately after the two Speeches, to declare to the Commons, " That he had " given order to the Lord Chancellor to send out Writs,
" for the better supply of their House, having been prece-
" dents for it; but if any scruple or question did arise " about it, he left it to the House to debate as soon as they " could." Accordingly, the very next day the Commons voted those Writs and Returns irregular, and expelled all the members thus elected.

Members were out of the House.

Two parties in the Parliament.

There were in this Parliament, as in most others, two parties, called the Court and Country party. This was their distinction, and it manifestly implied, that the interests of the Court were directly opposite to those of the People; as the interests of one party are usually to those of the contrary. The Court-party had always prevailed, while the People were persecuted of the good intentions of the King and his Ministers. But as the King discovered himself, both by his way of living, and frequent signs of irreligion; or by his inclination for the Papists; or by his profligacy, and avidity of money; or lastly, by his union with France, and the war with the States, his party sensibly decreased every day, for two very natural reasons. First, because many of those members, who, at the beginning, were of the King's party through inclination and zeal for Religion, whilst they considered him as protector of the Church of England, lost this inclination, as soon as they were convinced, that the King was far from designing the good of the Church or State. The King's protestations lost all their effect, when it was once seen, that his actions corresponded to little with his words. Secondly, for the same reason, the people, perceiving that Religion and the State were in danger, chose such representatives to fill the vacancies of the House, whose principles were directly opposite to the designs of the Court. As the vacancies by the death of the members could not but be very numerous in a against.

Parliament, which had now sat twelve years, the Country party came by degrees to prevail, and the King and his Ministers no longer found it so easy to carry whatever they desired, as at the beginning of the Parliament. It is certain, so long as the people do not suspect the King of ill designs against Liberty and Religion, the Court-party prevail in the Parliament, or rather there are not then two different parties. For, supposing the King an exact observer of the Laws himself, and careful to see them punctually obeyed, there can be no difference between the two parties, but with respect to the quantity of money granted to the King.
But as the people are under obligations to the King, for his maintenance of order, equity, moderation, and justice in the Government, they are never uneasy with the power and wealth heaped on such a King, and commonly the Country-party, if there is one in the Parliament, is much inferior to the King's. But the case is quite different, when the people are once prejudiced against their Sovereign, and no longer confide in his promises. For then, the Court party is composed of men, who have only their own private fortune in view, and is not so numerous as that of the people, which, besides the publick interest, finds likewise a private advantage in opposing the designs of the Court.
In this case, the people usually chuse able representatives, and such as are beloved well affected to their country, and it is very rarely that the intrigues of the Court are capable of hindering these elections. A proof of what I advance was seen in the elections of the Parliament of the 3d of November 1640, under Charles I, wherein the Country party was so superior to that of the Court. This proof is confirmed by the transactions of the Parliament I am now speaking of, which for twelve years had appeared so devoted to the King, and which changed from one extreme to another, when they had once lost their former confidence in the King and his Ministers. It is in vain to ascribe this change to the intrigues and cabals of some particular enemies of the Court. Never would private persons be powerful enough to corrupt a whole Parliament, or the greater part, if their credit was not built upon the mismanagement of the King and his Ministers. As we are entering upon a new period, I believed it necessary to prepare the Reader for this change, by showing him the true cause of it.

We have seen in the two Speeches of the King and the Chancellor, what vast supplies the King demanded of his Parliament, namely, a considerable aid for the sea-service; another for the land; a third to discharge some old debts;
a fourth to refund the money taken out of the Exchequer, and which could not amount to less than two millions two hundred and fifty thousand pounds sterling for the space of seventeen months. All this computed, must have amounted at least to five millions. Though the Chancellor's Speech made but little impression on the Commons, they would however show, that in demanding a redress of grievances, as was their intention, they did not act through a spirit of passion and revenge. Wherefore, though they were by no means convinced of the necessity or justice of the war undertaken by the King, they voted a supply of an eighteen months assessment of seventy thousand pounds per Annum, which in all amounted to twelve hundred and sixty thousand pounds, for the King's extraordinary occasions, without specifying that it was for the support of the war. But for fear the King should prorogue them when the money-bill was passed, they resolved that the redress of Grievances should keep an even pace with it.

For this purpose, the 9th of February the Commons presented an address to the King, in which they told him—" That having taken into consideration his de" claration for indulgence to Dissenters, they found them" selves bound in duty to inform his Majesty, That Penal " Laws in matters ecclesiastical cannot be suspended but by " Act of Parliament; they therefore most humbly besought
" his Majesty, to give such directions, That no apprehen" sions or jealousies, might remain in the hearts of his faith" ful Subjects." To this address the King sent the fol" lowing answer. " That he is very much troubled, that " the declaration which he put out for ends so necessary " to the quiet of this Kingdom, especially in that con-
" juncture, should prove the cause of disquiet, and give " occasion to the questioning of his power in ecclesiasticks,
" which he finds not done in the reigns of any of his " ancestors. That he never had thoughts of using it " otherwise than as it hath been intrusted in him to the " peace and establishment of the Church of England, and " the ease of all his Subjects in general: Neither doth he " pretend to suspend any Laws wherein the Properties,
" Rights, or Liberties of any of his Subjects are con" cerned, nor to alter any thing in the established Doctr" ine or Discipline of the Church of England: But his " only design in this was, to take off the penalties in" flicted by Statutes upon the Dissenters, and which he " believed, when well considered of, they themselves

The King's
answer.
Feb. 23.

"would not wish executed according to the rigour of the Law: Neither hath he done this with any thought of avoiding, or precluding the advice of his Parliament; and if any Bill shall be offered to him, which shall appear more proper to attain the aforesaid ends, and secure the peace of the Church and Kingdom, when tendered in due manner to him, He will show how readily he will concur in all ways that shall appear for the good of the Kingdom."

The Commons easily perceived, the King was not inclined to desist from his declaration. Wherefore, three days after, they presented another address, in which, "They thanked him for his gracious assurances and promises of maintaining the Religion established, and the Liberties and Properties of the People: And they did not in the least doubt, but that his Majesty had the same gracious intentions in giving satisfaction to his Subjects, by his answer to their last petition and address: But that they found, that the said answer was not sufficient to clear the apprehensions that might justly remain in the minds of his People, by his Majesty's having claimed a power to suspend penal Laws in matters religious, official, and which his Majesty did still seem to assert, in the said answer, to be entitled in the Crown, and never questioned in any of the reigns of his ancestors: Wherein they humbly conceived his Majesty had been much misinformed, since no such power had ever been claimed or exercised by any of his Majesty's predecessors. And if it should be admitted, might tend to the interrupting the free course of the Laws, and altering the legislative power, which had always been acknowledged to be in the two Houses of Parliament. They therefore with an unanimous consent became humble suitors to his Majesty, that he would be pleased to give them a full and satisfactory answer to their said petition and address, and that his Majesty would take such effectual order, That the proceedings in this matter, might not for the future be drawn into consequence or example." The King's answer to this address was, "It is of consequence, and I will take it into consideration."

At the time, these addresses were preparing, Sir Joh. Charlton, Speaker of the House of Commons being taken ill, humbly prayed his Majesty, that he might be eased of the burden he was not able longer to sustain. Edward Seymour, so famous in the reign of William III. was, by the Court's recommendation, chosen in his room.

The King and the Cabal were extremely mistaken in imagining, that the declaration for liberty of Conscience, would gain the Presbyterians, in return for so great a favour. The leaders of the Presbyterians were too wise to be taken in so palpable and dangerous a snare. It was easy for them to see, they were only designed for instruments to advance the interests of the Romish Religion. When they reflected, that this favour was received from the King, the Duke of York, and the members of the Cabal, they could not believe, it flowed from a principle of Religion or humanity. They saw besides so many extraordinary proceedings, so many invasions upon the Rights of the People; the Papists indulged in their Religion; the King making exorbitant demands upon his Parliament; an army incamped at the very gates of London (1) in the midst of winter; a war begun to destroy the only Protestant State capable of supporting Religion; and Papists in the principal posts; all this sufficiently demonstrated, that the suspension of the Penal Laws was not for their sake. So, instead of thanking the King for this pretended favour, Alderman Love, a City-Member, and an eminent Dissenter, spoke with the greatest warmth against the declaration (2). This declaration for Liberty of Conscience, wrought a great change in the House of Commons. For that House, which had been so fiercely animated against the Presbyterians, seeing them sacrifice their own, to the interest of Religion and the Kingdom, ordered a Bill to be brought in for their ease; a Bill by which all the penalties against them in the Act of Uniformity were removed, and nothing required but the taking the oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy. This Bill was read the first time on the 27th of February, and in a few days was completed. But the Lords having made some amendments, the King prorogued the Parliament before these amendments could be agreed to by the Commons.

This Bill, which was readily passed by the Commons, sufficiently showed their distrust of the Court with regard to the declaration for Liberty of Conscience, since by it all pretence was taken away of confounding the Presbyterians with the other Non-conformists. So long as the Commons had not suspected the King's intention to favour the Papists, they had affected to rank all the Dissenters in one class, in order to include the Presbyterians in the Statutes made against the Non-conformists in general. But when the King was perceived to use this confusion to favour the Papists, the Commons were willing to own, the several sects ought to be distinguished, and rather than abandon Religion to the intrigues and artifices of the Court, and the Papists, resolved to ease the Presbyterians. In this, they discovered a true zeal for the Protestant Religion in general, knowing, it was not so dangerously attacked by the Presbyterians, as by the Papists. But it was not on this occasion only that they showed their attachment to the Protestant Religion. At the very time they were preparing the bill for the ease of the Presbyterians, another was brought in to enjoin frequent catechizing in the Parochial Churches (3) for the instruction of youth, intimating thereby, how necessary this precaution was thought in the present juncture. But this Bill, as well as the other, was rendered abortive by the prorogation of the Parliament (4).

There is no plainer indication, of what the Parliament thought of the designs of the Court in favour of the Papists, than the address presented by both Houses to the King about the same time. This address contained, first complaints on the growth of Popery; on the great relief of Romish Priests and Jesuits in the Kingdom; on the admission of so many Recusants into places of trust, and particularly in the army. After this, the two Houses desired, "1. That his Majesty would be pleased to issue out his royal Proclamation, to command all Priests and Jesuits (with exception of those in attendance upon the Queen, not being natural-born Subjects) to depart within thirty days out of the Kingdom: And that his Majesty would be pleased, in the same Proclamation, to command all Judges and other officers, to put the Laws in execution against all such Priests and Jesuits, as should be found in the Kingdom after that time. 2. That his Majesty would be pleased likewise to issue out commissions, to tender the oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy to all officers and soldiers now in his service and pay, and that such as refused the said oaths, might be immediately disbanded. 3. That the communitaries of the musters be commanded and enjoined by his Majesty's warrant, upon the penalty of losing their places, not to permit any officer to be mustered in the service and pay of his Majesty, until he hath taken the oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy, and received the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, according to the usage of the Church of England; and that every soldier should take the said oaths before his first muster, and receive the Sacrament in like manner, before his second muster." Upon this address, the King published a Proclamation in the usual stile, the seventh of that kind, by which (after a declaration, that as he had always adhered to the Church of England, against all temptations whatsoever, so he was resolved to maintain and defend it) he strictly commanded all Jesuits and Romish Priests to depart the Kingdom, and the Laws to be put in due execution, against all popish Recusants, or justly suspected to be so, &c. This Proclamation was not satisfactory to the Commons, because it extended but to one single article of their petition, without any mention of the removal of Papists from places of trust. Wherefore, they proceeded to a new Bill, in order to obtain their end, being resolved not to finish the money-bill, till they had procured a redress of their grievances, and particularly a revocation of the declaration for Liberty of Conscience.

The King was never so perplexed since his restoration. The Cabal had promised to make him absolute, but, after all, suggested no other means, than the using of force, at all hazards. He had hoped to attain his aim by degrees, in gaining now one point, then another, and to see himself at last able to trample on all his opposers. He had moreover relied on the assistance of France, after the Commonwealth of Holland should be destroyed. But he had preposterously imagined, he should have time to form all his measures, and be able to support his design, whenever it should be opposed. Perhaps too, he had depended upon the condescension of this Parliament, which had always been so favorable to him. But as the Commons were proceeding, the time was come, that the King must either give way, or break with the Parliament. In this last case, he had too much sense to believe, that a handful of Papists, with a few flattering Courtiers and Ministers, were able to support him, at a time when he could expect no assistance from France, and when the Male-contents might be countenanced by a Dutch fleet. Besides, his Exchequer was empty; And therefore he must have resolved to raise money on his Subjects by means of his army: For he knew,

(1) On Black-Heath; raised without advice of Parliament, and under many popish officers. Kent, p. 318.

(2) He declared, He was much rather that he should lose his liberty, than have it in a way that would prove so detrimental to the Nation. Ibid.

1672-3. if he had not wherewith to content his adherents, he would hardly engage them to betray the interests of their Country. But this army was Protestant, excepting a few Popish officers and soldiers. The officers of the fleet, and the sailors, were also Protestants. It was therefore unnatural to expect to engage such a fleet and army in his designs, so contrary to their Religion and Liberties. Lastly, he considered, that these very Ministers and Courtiers, who appeared so devoted to his service, would desert him, as it happened to the King his father, when he should be no longer able to protect them. In a word, it was too soon to begin the execution of a project of this nature, for which he was unprepared, and yet, by the Parliament's last address, he was obliged either to execute, or relinquish it. His honour seemed engaged to support the declaration for Liberty of Conscience, for he had told the Parliament, that he would adhere to it, and his inclination led him to favour the Papists, whose Religion he had secretly embraced. He found himself moreover obliged, not to abandon to the resentment of the Parliament, Ministers, who, in giving him their advice, had depended upon his protection. But honour was not capable to balance the difficulties which he foresaw, if he persisted in his enterprise. On the other hand, his Council was divided. The Duke of Ormond, and the Earl of Arlington advised him to wait a more favorable opportunity; but the Duke of York, and the rest of the Cabal, were for his throwing off the mask, and supporting his declaration. They represented, that his father's ruin was owing to his condescending to the first demands of the Parliament of 1640; and said, they saw no less cause to fear now; for should the declaration be recalled, other demands would be set up, which would never end, till they were carried so high, that the King would not be able to grant them, without undoing himself: And that after a thousand concessions, he would be at last forced to break with the Parliament, and all the fruit he should reap from his compliance, would be to make them the bolder. They farther added, that his holding his resolution a few days would bring the Parliament to reason, his Majesty having a party among them which began to make the leaders waver; and that there were forces sufficient on foot to support the one side, and intimidate the other. It is pretended, the Earl of Shaftsbury undertook to answer for the success. All this was very capable to hold the King in suspense. It is believed, the Ladies engaged in this affair, and fearing that a rupture would deprive them of the King's bounties, strongly solicited him to recall his declaration. However that be, the King, after some hesitation, called for the declaration, and with his own hands broke the Seal.

The 8th of March the King came to the Parliament, and after pressing the Commons to dispatch the Money-bill, said to both Houses, — "If there be any scruple yet remaining with you touching the suspension of the penal Laws, I here faithfully promise you, that what hath been done in that particular, shall not for the future be drawn into example and consequence; and as I daily expect from you a bill for my supply, so I assure you, I shall as willingly receive and pass any other you shall offer me, that may tend to the giving you satisfaction in all your just grievances."

This Speech was so agreeable to the Parliament, that both Houses went in a body and thanked the King for so full and satisfactory an answer.

But if the two Houses were pleased, the Cabal was not so. They had formed a project, and prepared a scheme to render the King absolute. Nay, they had taken some steps towards the execution. This scheme had never been formed, had it not been supposed, the King would have the courage and resolution to withstand the complaints of the Parliament: For the projectors could never think, the Parliament would suffer the Liberties of the people to be invaded without opposition. All their hope therefore was founded upon the King's steadiness. They were to engage in a contest, in which they flattered themselves to render the King victorious. But they saw, to their great astonishment, the King was retreating, when he should have prepared for battle, and consequently the hopes of victory were entirely vanquished. But this was not all that he had to fear; they were in danger of being abandoned by the King, after this first step, to the resentment of the two Houses; for how could they hope for the protection of the King, who had just given such manifest marks of his own fear?

The Earl of Arlington, as I have observed, had in some measure, deserted the Cabal, by his advice to the King, to revoke his declaration for Liberty of Conscience. The Earl of Shaftsbury soon followed him, but in a manner more surprising, more publick, and with more remarkable circumstances. As soon as he saw, the King had not sufficient resolution to execute the great work which was projected, he thought it but just to forsake a Prince, who had forsaken himself, and left his counsellors exposed to danger.

This was the second time the Earl had experienced the King's inconstancy, and want of resolution. This affair of the Declaration was common to him with the rest of the Cabal. But the Writs issued out of Chancery for the election of Members to fill the vacancies in Parliament, were peculiar to him. He had undertaken to issue these writs as Chancellor, on pretence of some precedents which were never known, upon the King's positive promise to stand by him, and yet, he was deserted by the King, at the first instance of the Commons, or rather before their complaints. This was, however, a thing of very great consequence. For if the Crown could have issued Writs for filling the vacancies in Parliament, it would have been very easy for the Ministers to have had such members returned as they pleased, as it happened on this first occasion, wherein all those that were chosen were creatures of the Court. Father Orleans, who received his information of the English affairs from King James II, positively affirms, as one that could not be mistaken when he follows such a guide, "That the ancient custom was, on the death of a member, for the Chancellor to issue a writ under the Great Seal, for the election of another: And though the writ contained nothing to obstruct the freedom of the elections, yet the King might find means to prevent any Member from being chosen, who was against him. That this custom had been changed during the troubles of the last reign, when the Commons assumed the power of issuing the writs by their Speaker, and that this abuse had been suffered to continue, since the King's restoration, thro' the weakness or ignorance of the Chancellors before Shaftsbury." But this is a groundless assertion, as appears from what the King said himself to both Houses, at the beginning of this session. "That he had given order to the Lord Chancellor to send out writs, for the better supply of their House, having seen precedents for it." Had this been a Right inherent in the Crown, and first invaded by the Commons, during the troubles of the last reign, would the King have said only, that he had seen some precedents for it. This remark is only to shew, with what caution the History of Father Orleans, tho' dictated by King James himself, is to be read.

The Earl of Shaftsbury was therefore more exposed to the resentment of the Commons, than any other of the Cabal, not only for pernicious counsels given the King, in conjunction with his four colleagues, the secret whereof was not yet known, but chiefly for the writs issued by him as Chancellor, so destructive of their rights and privileges. He had therefore reason to fear a vigorous prosecution for this fact, and it is certain, the party opposite to the Court had already projected an accusation against him. On the other hand, the weakness he had discovered in the King, gave him no hopes of a protection from thence. He believed, therefore, he had no other way to divert the impending storm, than by quitting the King's party, and throwing himself into the contrary. "He executed this resolution, says Father Orleans, the day after the King resolved to revoke his declaration for Liberty of Conscience. It was eleven at night before the King had taken his last resolution, and the next morning the Earl of Shaftsbury appeared in the House of Lords, at the head of the most violent party, against the Catholic Religion, the Dutch war, and the union with France." He did more, if Father Orleans is to be credited, for in a full House he discovered the reasons which had induced the King to grant Liberty of Conscience, join with France, and declare war against the States. I doubt not his discovering this secret to his new party, but confess, I must have better evidence than that of Father Orleans, to convince me, that this discovery was made publicly in a full House, and on this very occasion, especially, before the King and Duke of York, who were that day present in the House. This would have been a formal accusation against the King, the Duke of York, and the other four members of the Cabal, of which he could have given no proofs, if they had been demanded. He had too much sense to expose himself to such a danger. The occasion of his declaring publicly against the King, on the day I am speaking of, was this.

The Lord Treasurer Clifford, ignorant of Shaftsbury's intentions, paid him a visit the night before, and communicating to him a project for establishing a perpetual Fund to free the King from his dependence on the Parliament, read to him a Speech, he had prepared to speak on the morrow concerning this project in the House of Lords. The Earl of Shaftsbury seemed highly pleased with the Speech, and desired to hear it again. The next day, the King and Duke of York coming to the House to countenance this project with their presence, the Lord Clifford spoke his Speech. He had no sooner done, than the Earl of Shaftsbury stood up, and answered his Speech from the beginning to the end. He demonstrated this project to be extravagant and impracticable; that it would overturn the Government, and perhaps send the King and Royal Family abroad again, to spend their days in exile without hopes Father Orleans says he is sure.

1672-3. hopes of a return. If the Treasurer's Speech surprised the Lords who perceived the design of it, their astonishment was increased when they saw the Chancellor, a leading member of the Cabal, declare so openly against the King. It is said, the Duke of York, whilst Shaftsbury was speaking, whispered the King, What a Rogue have you of a Lord Chancellor! And that the King replied, What a Fool have you of a Lord Treasurer! I know not whether the truth of these particulars is to be relied on, some of which are improbable. For what likelihood is there, that the King, after breaking the seal of his declaration with his own hands, for fear of the Parliament, should appear, within a few hours after, in the House of Lords, to support, by his presence, the Treasurer's project, which tended to the subversion of Parliaments? Or that he should call the Treasurer fool, for a proposal which the King could not be ignorant of, and had doubtless approved (1)?

Address to the Prayer committee of the Lords of Shaftsbury.

However, the Earl of Shaftsbury from this time was always in the head of the Country party, and caused the King to undergo great mortifications, as will hereafter appear. But I must give here a very material caution to those who read Father Orleans's History, or such English or foreign authors as espouse the King's cause. All these writers paint the Earl of Shaftsbury in very black colours. He was, according to them, the greatest villain that ever lived; his wickedness was answerable to the extent of his genius; and the depth of his penetration. He was perpetually contriving how to torment the King and Duke of York, or rather to ruin them irrecoverably. He was not only the head but the soul, of his party, by which they were actuated. In short, every thing transacted afterwards by the Parliament against the King, is solely imputed to him, and it is artfully insinuated, that, had it not been for such an agent, the nation would have remained in tranquillity, and the Parliament, content with the King's favorable answers, and gracious promises, would have been quiet, and attempted nothing against the Court. Thus, according to these writers, all the measures and precautions taken afterwards by the Parliament against the designs of the Court, were entirely owing to Shaftsbury's malice and revenge. It is easy to perceive, that their design is to cause to vanish, the grounds of the Parliament's fear and complaint of the conduct of the Court, by insinuating, that these complaints were frivolous, and the effects of Shaftsbury's vengeance, who, they say, directed both Houses of Parliament, or rather had them entirely at command. For my part, I am no way concerned to vindicate the Earl of Shaftsbury's honour, but believe my self obliged to remark, for the more easy discovery of the truth, that the project of the Cabal to render the King absolute, and introduce Popery, is of unquestionable certainty. The authors just mentioned, scruple not to own it, and should they deny it, the thing would not be less true. Consequently the Parliament coming to a full and exact knowledge of this design, which was only suspected before, had all the reason in the world for their fear and caution against the King and his Ministers. This being granted, let the Earl of Shaftsbury have been a villain, or an honest man; let him have betrayed the King's secrets, and acted only through a spirit of revenge; let his fear of the Parliament be the sole motive of his engaging in the Country party against the King, or let him have acted from a principle of honour and duty, in order to save the Church and State, the thing itself remains the same. The good or bad quality of the Earl of Shaftsbury did not cause the Parliament to have more or less reason to fear the designs of the King and his Ministers. If they were prejudicial to Religion and the State, as cannot be denied, the Parliament had reason to take the best measures to prevent them. Why therefore are these measures, these precautions, ascribed to Shaftsbury's malice and artifices, since there was another and more natural cause. Before the Earl of Shaftsbury appeared in the party, contrary to the Court, the Parliament had begun to take these precautions, though the Court's designs were yet but suspected: They were better informed by the Earl of Shaftsbury; why therefore is it supposed, that after this information, they suddenly relinquish their former motives, and act only with a view to serve as instruments of Shaftsbury's revenge? This is not even probable, and yet the authors abovementioned lose no opportunity of reproaching the Earl of Shaftsbury, and ascribing solely to him all the mortifications, the King afterwards received. Besides the reader's instruction, my design, in what I have said, is to hinder such as have read, or shall read the other Historians, from thinking it strange that I do not every moment exclaim against the Earl of Shaftsbury's conduct, as if he were the sole author of what was done against the King; and that I content my self with saying in a word, this Lord used all his interest and credit to break the measures of the King and his Ministers.

Immediately after this change in the Earl of Shaftsbury, the Commons passed a Bill, afterwards called the Test-Act, intitled, An Act for preventing the danger which may happen from Popish Recusants. This Act required, that all persons enjoying any office or place of trust and profit, should take the oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy in publick and open Court, and should also receive the Sacrament in some Parish Church, immediately after Divine Service; and deliver a Certificate signed by the Ministers and Church-Wardens, attested by the oaths of two credible witnesses, and put upon record: and that all persons taking the said oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy should likewise make and subscribe this following declaration. — I do declare, That I do believe, that there is not any Transubstantiation in the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, or in the Elements of Bread and Wine, at, or after the consecration thereof, by any person whatsoever. — This Bill readily passed the House of Commons, and after some difficulties, was also approved by the Lords (2). The Earl of Bristol, March 15, a Papist, made a Speech on this occasion, and concluded E. hard. with saying, "Upon the whole matter, however the sentiments of a Catholic of the Church of Rome, (not of the Court of Rome) may oblige me, upon scruple of conscience, to give my negative to this Bill, yet as a member of a Protestant Parliament, my advice prudentially cannot but go along with the main scope of it, the present circumstances of time, and affairs considered, and the necessity of composing the disturbed minds of the People."

Besides this Bill there was another preparing to prevent intermarriages between Protestants and Papists. This tended directly to break the present negotiation of the Duke of York's marriage with an Archduchess of Imperium (3), and to hinder him from marrying any other Catholic Princess. The King, in the mean while, was very uneasy, as he saw, the Parliament was informed of his secret resolutions, and effectual measures were taken to prevent their execution. Wherefore he quickened the Commons by several messages, to finish the Money-bill. But, instead of satisfying him, the Commons, having provided for the security of Religion, presented him two addresses of grievances, one concerning England, the other Ireland. In the first, they told the King, that they were firmly persuaded of his intention to govern according to the laws and customs of the Kingdom. Yet finding that some abuses and grievances were crept into the Government, they craved leave humbly to represent them to his Majesty's knowledge, and to desire,

1. That the imposition of twelve pence per chaldron upon coals, for providing of convoys, by virtue of an order of Council dated the 15th of May 1672, confidence, shew the heads he intended to speak on to the King, who approved of them. He began the debate with rough words, calling the vote of the Commons, Monstrum horrendum, ignis, et in ignis. When he had done, the Earl of Shaftsbury, to the amazement of the whole House, laid, must differ from the Lord that spoke last, not only. He said, while these matters were debated out of doors, he might think with others, that the King's democracy did warrant the Declaration. But now, that such a House of Commons were no another mind, he submitted his reasons to others. They were the King's great Council, and must both advise and support him. The King was all in fury to be thus tormented by his Chancellor, and told the Lord Clifford, how well he was pleased with his Speech, and how highly offended with the other. The debate went on, and upon a division the Court had the majority. But above all, the most considerable of the House protested against the vote. Some Court law they gained nothing in carrying a vote, that drew after it such a procession. It seems, Clifford, Buckingham, and Lauderdale, were for violent measures, whilst Arlington and Shaftsbury pressed the King to content the Parliament. Accordingly, in the afternoon of the day that the matter had been argued in the House of Lords, Shaftsbury and Arlington got all those members of Commons, who were in the Court party, to go privately to the King one after another, and tell him, that upon Clifford's Speech the House was in such a rage, that probably they would have gone to impeachments, had it not been for Shaftsbury's speaking on the other side, who, they believed, spoke the King's sense, as the other did the Duke's. So they made the King apprehend, the Chancellor's Speech, with which he was so offended, was really a great service done to him, and persuaded him farther, that he might now save himself, and obtain an indemnity for his Ministers, if he would part with the Declaration, and pass the Bill. Whereupon, before night the King was quite changed, and said to his Brother, that Clifford had undone himself, and spoiled all by his Speech; and that Shaftsbury had spoke like a rogue, yet that had no repentance, which the other's indiscretion had kindled. The Duke, in the evening, told Clifford what the King said. Upon which Clifford went to the King, and said, he thought, that in what he had done he had both served and pleased the King, but was surprised to find by the Duke, that the King was of another mind. The King, in time confusion, owned, that all he had said, was only to show that he considered better what the Commons could bear. Clifford finding he must lose the White Staff, consulted with Buckingham whom he recommended just before, and they pitched upon Sir Thomas Osborne, afterwards Duke of Leeds, p. 3, 8, &c.

Shaftsbury was immediately promoted, it not invented by the Earl of Shaftsbury, who refused to strike directly at the Duke of York and his Friends. The Duke of York's marriage was concluded in October 1672; and, as the Earl of Arlington sent word to Sir Wm. G. that he was married, the Duke of York was married to the Archduchess of Austria. The Duke had, before this, made his Address to the Lady Betty.

1672-3. " may be recalled, and all Bonds, taken by virtue thereof, cancelled.

" 2. That his Majesty's Proclamation of the 4th of December 1672, For preventing disorders which may be committed by Soldiers, and whereby the soldiers now in his Majesty's service are in a manner exempted from the ordinary course of justice, may likewise be recalled.

" 3. And whereas great complaints have been made out of several parts of the Kingdom, of divers abuses committed in quartering of Soldiers, that his Majesty would be pleased to give orders to redress those abuses, and in particular, that no soldiers be hereafter quartered in any private Houses, and that due satisfaction may be given to the inn-keepers and victuallers where they lye, before they remove.

" 4. And, since the continuance of soldiers in this realm, will necessarily produce many inconveniences to his Majesty's Subjects, they humbly represented it as their petition and advice, that when this present war is ended, all the soldiers that have been raised since the last session of Parliament may be disbanded.

" 5. That his Majesty would likewise be pleased to consider of the irregularities and abuses in pressing soldiers, and give orders for the prevention thereof for the future."

These demands shew, how by degrees the Court was labouring to introduce an absolute authority: First, by a light imposition, by virtue of an order of Council, of twelve-pence upon every chaldron, or thirty-six Butshels of coals. The tax was inconsiderable, but the consequence very great. Secondly, the Magistrates, in assuming the power of quartering soldiers in private houses, easily found an opportunity to gall and oppress their enemies, and such as were not well-inclined to the Court. Thirdly, in pressing soldiers, the officers had room to commit many acts of injustice, by lifting not the most proper persons for the service, but the rich who were able to redeem themselves with money. Though this practice was much used with regard to sailors, and continues to this day, it had never extended to soldiers, or at least but on very extraordinary occasions.

The petition concerning the Irish grievances contained several articles, chiefly relating to Religion. In one of these the Commons desired, his Majesty would be pleased to dismiss out of all command, civil or military, Colonel Richard Talbot, who notoriously assumed the title of Agent for the Roman Catholics in Ireland, and forbid him all access to his Court. This Talbot was afterwards created Duke of Tyrconnel, and Lord Lieutenant of Ireland by James II. (1).

The King replied to these addresses, that as they consisted of so many different parts, it could not be expected he should give a present answer. But promised, that for the several particular things contained in them, he would before the next meeting take such effectual care, that no man should have reason to complain. After this the money-bill passed without opposition. But, not to approve expressly the war for which this money was intended, the Bill was intitled, A Supply of his Majesty's extraordinary occasions (2), and a particular proviso was tacked to it, That no Papist should be capable of holding any publick employment.

Before the Bill in favour of the Protestant-Disfenters and some others were ready, the King came to the Parliament the 29th of March, and passed several Acts, amongst which were the money-bill, the Test-Act, and an Act for a general and free pardon, but with many exceptions (3). Then he adjourned the Parliament to the 20th of October. If the King in his declaration for liberty of Conscience had intended the ease of the Protestant-non-conformists, as he would have had it believed, he might have deferred the adjournment of the Parliament a few days, till the Bill passed in their favour was ready, or at least might have pressed the two Houses to finish it. But as the Papists were excluded from the benefit of this Act, he showed no farther concern for the interest of the Presbyterians, but adjourned the Parliament before the Lords had given their consent to the Bill.

The Test-Act having received the Royal-assent, most of the Catholick officers quitted their places. The Duke of York himself who was Lord-High-Admiral, resigned that profitable office (4), and the Lord Clifford that of High-Treasurer. He retired to his paternal estate [at Chiddleigh] in Devonshire, where he died shortly after.

While these things passed in the Parliament, preparations for the Sea-war were making in England and Holland with equal ardour and vast expence. The Duke of York having resigned his office of Lord High-Admiral, Prince Rupert was appointed to command the fleet. Ruyter having secret intelligence, that the English fleet would not be ready so soon, put to sea with forty-two men of war, and sixteen vessels to be sunk in the Thames (5). He came into the mouth of the river the 2d of May, where he found he had been misinformed, and that forty-five large ships were coming to attack him. Upon this disappointment, he retired to expect the rest of his fleet at Schonevelt in Zealand.

In this interval, Prince Rupert failed to meet the French fleet coming from Brest, and joined them in the Channel the 16th of May. After this junction, the combined fleet consisted of one hundred and forty sail of all sorts, of which there were thirty large French ships (6). The Dutch fleet had but a hundred and nine sail, namely, fifty-four large ships, fourteen frigates, twenty-four fire-ships, eleven advice-boats, and six galliots (7). As I am not sufficiently versed in marine-affairs to give clear ideas of sea-engagements, I shall only say, that this year was signalized by three naval engagements, fought with such equal loss, that neither could justly boast of victory, tho' both challenged it in every battle. The first was fought near Schonevelt the 28th of May. The second off Flushing the 4th of June, but this was rather a cannonading of about four hours, after which, both sides retired to their respective coasts. The third, fought the 11th of August, was the most obstinate. The English lost Vice-Admiral Spragg, who was drowned in changing his ship (8), and the Dutch, Vice-Admiral Swerts. The loss of the great ships in these three engagements was inconsiderable, but on both sides many lesser ones were either burnt or sunk. In a word, nothing decisive happened at sea this campaign, and therefore I need not be more circumstantial (9).

As to what passed at land between France and the States, I shall only say, that the King of France took Maftricht in June, and the Prince of Orange, Naerden, a town near Amsterdam, in September, and afterwards Bonn, the residence of the Elector of Cologne, in October. These two conquests, and the necessity the King of France was under to maintain the war against Spain, (which had at last declared against him, besides that the Emperor, and several German Princes, were also upon the point of declaring for the States) obliged him to abandon all his conquests in the United-Provinces, except Maftricht and Grave, where he left garrisons, after having drawn out all the rest in November.

In the mean time, a Congress was held at Cologne for peace, but with no success.

The 19th of June the King, at Buckingham's recommendation, made Sir Thomas Osborn, afterwards Earl of Danby, Lord-Treasurer.

The Duke of York, as I have said, had cast his eyes upon an Archduchess of Inspruck, a branch of the House of Austria. But the Empress dying at that time, the Emperor married this Princess himself. The Duke was therefore obliged to make his addresses elsewhere, and as his zeal for the Popish Religion allowed him not to marry a Protestant Princess, he made choice of Maria [d'Este] Sister to Francis Duke of Modena, and the marriage was immediately concluded and solemnized by his proxy [Henry Mordaunt] Earl of Peterborough. The King of France greatly contributed to the marriage, by declaring the young Princess, then but fifteen years of age, an adoptive Daughter of France, and by engaging to pay her portion.

As the Duke's marriage with a Catholick Princess could not but be very disagreeable to the English, the Court easily foresaw, that the Parliament, which was to meet the 20th of October, would endeavour to oppose it. There were several Bills ready, which could be finished in few days; and as the Parliament was only adjourned, the Court feared they would begin with compleating these Bills, two of which the Court was desirous to put a stop to, namely,

(1) February 26. 1671. the King had issued out a Proclamation in Ireland, whereby he granted a general Licence to all Papists to live in Corporations, exercise Trades there, and enjoy the same privileges as other subjects ought to do, which was a greater privilege than his Protestant Subjects had, for by their Charter, all who were not free of the Corporations could not have the benefit of their Privileges. R. Cole, p. 166.

(2) The sum granted was twelve hundred thirty eight thousand, seven hundred and fifty pounds. Statutes 25 Car. II. c. 1.

(3) There was also an Act passed, to enable the County Palatine of Durham, to send Knights and Burgesses to serve in Parliament. Statute 25 Car. II. c. 1.

(4) Burnett says, when the Duke carried all his commissions to the King, he wept as he delivered them up, but the King showed no concern at all. P. 372.

(5) In order to stop the Company, Barredene, and Newcastle Fleets from coming in. Kennel, p. 323.

(6) The White Squadron was commanded by Count d'Erres, and the Blue by Sir Edward Spragg. Barchett, p. 408.

(7) Barchett says, it consisted of fifty men of war, twelve frigates, fourteen yachts, and twenty-five fire-ships. Tom. II. p. 412.

(8) He was forced to remove out of his Ship into the St. George, but the soon after losing her main-mast, he was obliged to leave her; and as he was going on board the Royal Charles, his Barge was sunk with a Cannon-shot. In this last engagement, Sir William Reeves and Captain Hyman were also lost, and 14 vessels captured by the French, and Captain Mervyn, both lost officers. Barchett, p. 404. Edward.

the Bill against Inter-marriages between Protestants and Papists, and that for the ease of the Protestant Dissenters. Wherefore the King easily resolved to prorogue the Parliament. The first thing the Commons did, after their meeting, was, to present an Address to the King, to desire that the Duke's marriage with the Princess of Modena might not be consummated, and that he might not be married to any but a Protestant. Upon this, the King prorogued the Parliament to the 27th of the same month, to defeat the two Bills above-mentioned, and some others not more agreeable to him.

The 27th of October the King coming to the Parliament with the usual formalities, made a Speech to both Houses, in which he told them, — "That having consented to a negotiation at Cologne, he hoped to have welcomed them with an honourable peace; but the Dutch had disappointed him in that expectation, and treated his Ambassadors at Cologne with the contempt of conquerors, and not as might have been expected from men in their condition. That this obliged him to move them again for a supply, the safety and honour of the nation necessarily requiring it; that it must be proportionable to the occasion, and it he had it not speedily, the mischief would be irreparable in his preparations for the next spring." — He told them, "That he was steady in maintaining all the professions and promises made to them concerning Religion and Property; and should be very ready to give them fresh instances of his zeal for preserving the established Religion and Laws, as often as any occasion shall require. In the last place, he commended to their consideration and care, the debt he owed the Goldsmiths, in which very many other of his good Subjects were involved."

This debt to the Goldsmiths was contracted by the King when he shut up the Exchequer, and amounted to more than two millions Sterling. Thus the King, after a seizure of other men's property, by a pure act of authority, pretended, it belonged to the Parliament to make reparation, on account of the application of this money to a war, of which he had not vouchsafed to communicate the design to them. This was the hardest case that had for a long time happened in England. For, on one hand, it was a melancholy thing to see so many families ruined, in support of an expence which ought to have been common to the whole nation. But on the other hand, to pay this debt, was to establish a precedent of a terrible consequence, and authorize the King and his successors to employ the same, or the like methods, for raising of money, without consent of Parliament. As for the twelve hundred and sixty thousand pounds granted the King for his extraordinary occasions in the last session, he believed, that sum ought not to be employed in discharging this debt, nor even in maintaining the Dutch war, since a new supply was demanded for that purpose.

After the King had ended his Speech, the Chancellor enlarged with great eloquence upon all the points touched by the King. But his speech made little impression upon the Commons. They were no sooner returned to their House, but instead of voting the King thanks for his Speech, they adjourned themselves to the 30th of the month. The same day the King sent them his answer to their address concerning the Duke of York's marriage, the substance of which was, — "That he perceived the House of Commons had wanted a full information of this matter, the marriage not being barely intended, but completed, according to the forms used amongst Princes, and by his royal consent and authority: Nor could he in the least suppose it disagreeable to the House of Commons, his Royal Highness having been, in the view of the world, for several months, engaged in a treaty of marriage with another Catholic Prince, and yet a Parliament held during the time, and not the least exception taken at it." The House was by no means pleased with this answer; and therefore resolved to present a second address, with their reasons against this marriage. The same day, it was voted, that a Bill should be prepared for a general Telt between Protestants and Papists, that is to say, an oath which should serve to distinguish Protestants from Papists, with this clause, That they who refused to take it should be incapable of bearing any office civil or military, or to sit in Parliament, or to come within five miles of the City.

The 11th of October the Commons took the King's Speech into consideration, and after a serious debate in a grand committee, came to the following resolution, "That the House considering the present condition of the nation, will not take into any further debate, the consideration of any Aid, or Supply, or Charge upon the Subject, before the time of payment of the eighteen months self-maintenance granted by a late Act of Parliament, intitled, An Act for raising the sum of twelve hundred, thirty-eight thousand, seven hundred, and fifty pounds, be expired; except it shall appear, that the obliquity of the Dutch shall render it necessary; nor before this Kingdom be effectually secured from Popery, and popish counsellors, and the other present Grievances be redressed."

The King, as may well be imagined, was extremely offended with this resolution, and the more so it was followed by an Address for a general Fast, to be observed throughout the whole Kingdom, which intimated to the people, that the Kingdom was in great danger. Two days after, the House in a body waited on the King with a second address against the Duke of York's marriage, in which, after many compliments, they repented to him,

1. That if this match do proceed, it will be a means to disquiet the minds of his Protestant Subjects at home; and to fill them with endless jealousies and dissensions; and will bring his Majesty into such alliances abroad, as will prove highly prejudicial, if not destructive to the interests of the very Protestant Religion itself.

2. They find by sad experience, that such marriages had increased and encouraged Popery in the Kingdom, and had given opportunity to Priests and Jesuits, to propagate their opinions, and seduce great numbers of his Majesty's Subjects.

3. They do already observe, how much the party is animated with the hopes of this match, which was lately discouraged by his Majesty's gracious concessions in the last meeting of the Parliament.

4. They greatly fear this may be an occasion to lessen the affections of the people to his Royal Highness, who is so nearly related to the Crown, and whose honour and esteem they desire may always be entirely preserved.

5. That for another age more at least, this Kingdom will be under the continual apprehensions of the growth of Popery, and the danger of the Protestant Religion. Lastly, they considered, that this Prince, having so near a relation and kindred to many eminent persons of the Court of Rome, may give them great opportunities to promote their designs, and carry on their practices here, and by the same means penetrate into his Majesty's most secret Councils, and more easily discover the state of the whole Kingdom.

And finding by the opinions of very learned men, that it is generally admitted, That such Treaties and Contracts by proxies are dissoluble, of which there are several instances to be produced, they do in all humility beseech his Majesty, to put a stop to the consummation of this intended marriage.

And this they do the more importunately desire, because they have not, as yet, the happiness to see any issue of his Majesty, that might succeed in the government of his Kingdom.

----- To this address the King briefly replied, That it was a matter he would take into his present consideration, and would speedily return an answer.

After which the Commons proceeded farther, and voted the Standing army a grievance, and accordingly, prepared an address to be presented to his Majesty, shewing, That the Standing-army was a grievance, and a burthen to the Kingdom.

But the 4th of November, the day on which the Commons were to present their Address, the King came unexpectedly to the House of Peers, and sent for the Commons. It happened that the Speaker and the Usher of the Black-Rod met both at the door of the House of Commons, but, as the Speaker was within the House, the door was immediately shut against the Usher, who came with the King's Message. The Speaker was forced into the Chair, and while the Usher continued knocking at the door, the House voted,

1. That the Alliance with France was a Grievance. 2. That the evil Counsellors about the King were a Grievance. And 3. That the Duke of Lauderdale was a Grievance, and not fit to be trusted or employed in any office or place of trust. Upon which there was a general cry, to the question, to the question! But, the Black-Rod knocking earnestly at the door, the Speaker leaped out of the Chair, and the House rose in great confusion.

When the Commons came to the House of Lords, the King made a short Speech to both Houses, in which he represented the great advantages which the enemy would reap from the least appearance of a difference between him and his Parliament. — He told them, he would not be wanting to let all his Subjects see, That no care should be greater than his own in the effectual suppressing of Popery. He then prorogued the Parliament to the 7th day of January following, and thus put an end to the twelfth session of this long Parliament, which had continued but nine days.

Immediately after the prorogation of the Parliament, the King took the Great-Seal from the Earl of Shaftesbury, and gave it to Sir Heneage Finch (†), with the title of Lord Keeper. Soon after, the King ordered that no person who was a Roman-Catholic, or reputed to be so, should 1673. should presume to come near his person or Court. He likewise published a Proclamation for the rigorous execution of the laws against Papists. This was the eighth of the kind since his restoration, and executed as the other seven.

But this Proclamation was not capable to remove the fears occasioned by the Duke of York's marriage with the Princess of Modena, which was consummated the 21st of November, on the day of her arrival in England with the Duchess her mother (1).

1673-4. The Parliament meeting the 7th of January, the King represented to both Houses.—"That no proposal of peace from the Dutch had been yet offered with an intent to conclude, but only to amuse: That therefore, the way to a good peace, was to set out a good fleet, which there was time enough to do effectually, if the supply was not delayed.—That a speedy, a proportionable, and above all, a cheerful aid, was now more necessary than ever: He once more told them in mind of his debt to the Goldsmiths: And then told them, that his alliance with France had been very strangely misrepresented to them, as if there were certain secret articles of dangerous consequence; but he would make no difficulty of letting the treaties, and all the articles of them, without any the least reserve, be seen by a small committee of both Houses, who might report the true scope of them."

Then the Lord Keeper enlarged upon all these points with excessive flattery to the King, for his extraordinary care to maintain the Laws and Religion, and that this might not be doubted, he alleged for proof, the assurances given by the King. Above all, he magnified the King's offer, of letting them see the treaties with France, as a confession which could not be sufficiently acknowledged, but by an extraordinary supply. In a word, the King's and the Keeper's Speeches were founded upon this principle, that the war with the States was just and necessary, and consequently to be vigorously maintained, in order to an honorable peace.

It does not appear, that the two Houses much regarded the King's offer of laying before them his treaties with France, since it was in his power to shew them what he pleased, and suppress the rest. The King perceived therefore, into what difficulties the Cabal had thrown him by their violent counsels. He had lost the confidence of his people, and neither his words nor his promises were any longer relied on. It was in vain for him to profess his zeal for the Protestant Religion, and the Liberties of his Subjects: these professions could not obliterate his past proceedings, which gave but too just cause to suspect his sincerity. Wherefore, the Parliament, without regarding his words, considered his actions, and laboured to take effectual measures, to prevent the execution of the Court's designs, which were but too manifest. There were many things concerning which they openly expressed their fear and discontent. 1. The growth of Popery publicly encouraged by the Court. 2. The exorbitant power of France, which in the end could not but prove prejudicial to England. 3. The Dutch war, undertaken directly contrary to the interest of England, and for which however the King was incessantly demanding supplies, on a supposition of its being just and necessary, though he had alleged no lawful cause for it. 4. The management of affairs in Ireland, where the Act of Establishment was openly trampled upon, and Papists continually advanced or encouraged. 5. The King's proceedings in England, which were clear evidences of his principles and designs; namely, his raising a land-army without any necessity; his granting Liberty of Conscience by his sole authority; his shutting up the Exchequer; his dispensing with Acts of Parliament; his making a strict alliance with France, when he should rather have used his endeavours to oppose the increase of her greatness. 6. The open profession of the popish Religion by the Duke of York, and his marriage with a popish Princess, authorized by the King notwithstanding the remonstrances of the Parliament. 7. The three Ministers, still employed by the King, namely, Arlington, Buckingham, and Lauderdale, all three of the most arbitrary principles, plainly shewed, it was not for the good of the Kingdom, that the King used their counsels. These were too real causes of complaint, to be silenced by the King's general professions, on every occasion, to maintain the Laws and Religion. Something more substantial than words was necessary to dispel the suspicions and fears of the People and Parliament. Wherefore the Parliament resolved to restore the Government to its natural state. This very Parliament which had considered as execrable rebels, the opposers of Charles I's usurpation, was obliged to pursue the same measures against the encroachments of Charles II, as were begun with by the Parliament of 1640.

If this produced not a civil war, it is to be ascribed to the weakness, fears, or, perhaps, to the abilities of the King, who, less obstinate, and more discerning than his father, did not think proper to abandon himself entirely to the counsels of his Ministers, and particularly of the Duke his brother. For, certainly, as the Parliament stood affected, an extreme confusion, if not a second, and more bloody civil war, must have been the consequence of the King's attachment to his principles and designs. Nothing is more proper to confirm this conjecture, than the revolution in the reign of James II. That Prince, naturally more furious and obstinate than his brother, resolving to run all hazards, found the English, in their turns, as resolute to venture all in the defence of their Laws, Religion, and Liberty.

In order to proceed according to this Plan, the House of Lords presented an Address to the King, praying him to issue out his royal Proclamation, requiring all Papists (and reputed Papists) to remove out of London and Westminster, during the Session of the Parliament. Accordingly his Majesty without delay published a Proclamation, dated the 14th of January, declaring, "That as he had always manifested his zeal for the preservation of the true Religion established in this Kingdom, and to hinder the growth and increase of Popery, so he was now ready, upon this occasion, to prevent all fears and dangers that might arise by the concurrence of persons of that profession, in or near the Cities of London and Westminster, &c." This pretended zeal had shewed itself but in eight Proclamations, already published by him at several times against the Papists, the negligent execution of which is very visible from the number. When the King's affectation of boasting continually his zeal for the Protestant Religion, and against Popery is considered, and when on the other hand it is remembered, that he had abjured the Protestant Religion, and had a Chapel secretly in his Palace, where he daily heard Mass, and sometimes even communicated the same day at his Protestant and Popish Chapels, one knows not what to think of such monstrous dissimulation.

The next day, both Houses joined in an address to the King for a General Fast, to implore God's Blessing against the efforts of Popery, &c. Nothing was more offensive to the King than such addresses, which plainly implied, that Religion was in danger, and through his fault; but he durst not refuse them, and therefore the 4th of February was appointed for a day of humiliation.

At last, the Commons taking the King's last Speech into consideration, voted, "That the House will in the first place proceed to have their Grievances effectually redressed, the Protestant Religion, their liberties and properties effectually secured, and to suppress Popery, and remove all persons and counsellors popishly affected, or otherwise obnoxious or dangerous to the Government." Then they presented an address to the King, "That the Militia of the City of London, and County of Middlesex, might be in readiness at an hour's warning, and the Militia of all other Counties of England at a Day's warning, for suppressing of all tumultuous Insurrections which might be occasioned by Papists or any other male-contented persons." The King answered to this Address, "That he would take a special care, as well for the preservation of their persons, as of their liberties and properties."

This Address was only to insinuate to the people, that the Kingdom was in danger, and to justify beforehand the measures intended to be taken by the House, against those who were considered as the principal authors of this danger, I mean, the Members of the Cabal. By the death of Lord Clifford, and the change in the Earl of Shaftsbury, this Council was reduced to three, namely, the Dukes of Buckingham and Lauderdale, and the Earl of Arlington. The House began with the Duke of Lauderdale, and unanimously voted, "That an Address should be presented to his Majesty, to remove the Duke of Lauderdale from all his employments, and from his presence, and Councils for ever, being a person obnoxious and dangerous to the Government."

The Duke of Buckingham, while the Commons were debating upon the heads of his accusation, requested to be heard before their House, which was granted. But as his Speech, in vindication of himself, was full of ambiguities, the House referred his examination to the next day, and drew up some queries, to which he was required to give distinct answers. As these questions follow from what had passed, and tend to illustrate the History, I think myself

1. Whether any persons declared to his Grace any ill advice or purposes against the liberties and privileges of the House of Commons, or to alter the Government; who they were, and what they advised?

2. Some words fell from your Grace yesterday, wherein you were pleased to say, you had got nothing, but others had gotten three, four, or five hundred thousand pounds; who were they that had gotten these sums, and by what means?

His answer to this was,——That he was not at all acquainted by what means they got so much: That the Duke of Ormond had got five hundred thousand pounds, which was upon record; that Lord Arlington had not got so much, but had got a great deal.

3. By whose advice was the army raised, and Monsieur Schomberg made General (2).

4. By whose advice was this army brought up to awe the debates and resolutions of the House of Commons?

5. Who made the Triple-alliance?

6. Who made the first treaty with France, by which the Triple-alliance was broken?

He answered, I made it.

7. By whose advice was the Exchequer shut up, and the order of payment there broken?

8. Who advised the Declaration in matters of Religion?

9. Who advised the attacking the Smyna fleet before the war was proclaimed (3)?

10. By whose advice was the second treaty at Utrecht?

11. By what counsel was the war begun without the Parliament, and thereupon the Parliament prorogued.

12. By whose advice was the Parliament prorogued the 4th of November last?

I did not think fit to add all the Duke's answers, because it is not just to prejudice the Reader against those whom the Duke of Buckingham accused to clear himself. But the questions are very proper to show, what it was that the Commons blamed in the conduct of the King and Cabal. They were so little satisfied with the Duke's answers, that they passed the same vote against him as against Londerdale.

*The Earl of

Id. p. 349.*

The Commons, it seems, principally intended to ruin the Earl of Arlington, since, notwithstanding his defence before the House, they drew up an impeachment against him, consisting of several Articles. But as this impeachment was not pursued, I don't think it just to infer the articles, since I cannot also infer what the Earl could urge in his defence. I shall therefore only say, that this impeachment chiefly concerned the open protection, granted by the Earl of Arlington as Secretary, to the Catholics; and some actions tending to promote arbitrary power, or his own private interest (4).

*A Bill for a Test.
Id. p. 350.*

After this, the Commons proceeded to prepare a bill for a general Test, by which every person refusing to take it, should be made incapable to enjoy any office civil or military, to sit in either House of Parliament, or to come within five miles of the Court. The Test was in these words:

The Test.

I do solemnly, from my heart, and in the presence of Almighty God profess, testify and declare, That I do not believe in my conscience that the Church of Rome is the only Catholic and universal Church of Christ, out of which there is no salvation; or that the Pope hath any jurisdiction or supremacy over the Catholic Church in general, or over my self in particular; or that it belongs to the said Church of Rome alone to judge of the true sense and interpretation of the Holy Scriptures; or that in the Holy Sacrament of the Eucharist, there is made a perfect change of the whole substance of the bread into Christ's body, or of the whole substance of the wine into Christ's blood, which change the said Church of Rome calleth Transubstantiation; or that the Virgin Mary, or any other Saint ought to be worshipped or prayed unto: And all those aforesaid doctrines and positions, I do renounce and disclaim, as false and erroneous, and

He justified his own defence, laying all the ill-counsels upon others, chiefly the Lord Arlington, intimating plainly that the root of all errors was in the King and Duke. He said, hunting was a good diversion, but if a man would hunt with a brace of lobbyists, he would have but ill sport. He had applied this saying to Prince Rupert and Lord Arlington, but now it was understood to go higher. Burnet, p. 357.

(3) He said, it was Lord Arlington. See Edward, Tom. III. p. 348.

(4) The Earl excused himself, but without blaming the King. This had so good an effect, that he was acquitted, tho' by a small majority. But the care he took to preserve himself, lost him his high favour with the King. Burnet, p. 366.

(5) The States, says Burnet, committed a great error in desiring this peace, without desiring at the same time, that King Charles should enter into the alliance for reducing the French to the terms of the Triple-alliance. But the Prince of Orange thought, that if he could once separate the King from his alliance with France, the other point would soon be brought about, p. 356.

(6) Lewis XIV. strenuously opposed the conclusion of this peace, and offered King Charles five millions and a half, with forty men of war, if he would break the negotiations. Burnet, Tom. II. p. 496.——After the signing of the peace, King Charles told the French Ambassador, that he had been doing a thing which went more against his heart, than the losing of his right hand. Burnet, p. 367.

contrary to God's word, and the Christian Religion. It was 1673-4. not without reason that this Oath was called the Test or Trial, since it was as a touch-stone to distinguish the Papists from the Protestants, there being no Catholic who could in conscience take this Oath. The King had already given his consent to an Act which imposed much the same oath. But that was only for those who were in office or employment, whereas this was universal, and might be required of all suspected persons. But, before the Bill was ready, the King prorogued the Parliament, and so defeated both this, and several other Bills tending to the same end.

Since the States-General had perceived that the Parliament approved not of the war the King was making upon them, they had never ceased to solicit the King to a separate peace (5), and had offered him whatever he could reasonably expect, in supposing he designed the advantage of his Kingdom. But as that was not the case, it is plain, their offers could not satisfy him. To content him, the Commonwealth of the Seven Provinces should have been entirely destroyed, and the King of France put in possession. But as he durst not openly avow this demand, he pretended to find in the offers of the States, only ambiguous or insidious propositions, and from thence took occasion to reject them. But affairs afterwards took a turn which obliged him to come into other measures. The victories he hoped for at sea with the assistance of France, came to nothing. If his fleet was not beaten in the four late engagements, at least, it had gained no advantage over that of the States. He had expected to give a mortal wound to the States by a descent into Holland, and for that purpose had sent for Schomberg to head his forces. But that General had been unsuccessful in his expedition, and obliged to return without any thing done. The King of France, as I said, had been forced to abandon his conquests in Holland, to defend himself against the new enemies raised him by the States. In short, the Parliament discovering the secret intent of this war, not only refused any farther supplies, but were preparing to bring the advisers to justice. On the other hand, the King had managed the money granted by Parliament, and that of the Exchequer, with so little economy, that he had not a shilling left. His profusion had been so excessive, that it appeared, from orders counterigned by the Earl of Arlington Secretary of State, that he had given away above three millions Sterling, to several private persons. In a word, he did not know which way to turn himself for the continuance of the war, as he saw his Parliament little inclined to furnish the means. All these reasons were very capable to induce him to listen to the offers made him by the States. He therefore began by degrees, to discover, that he should not be averse to a reasonable peace, provided the States would have such regard to his honour as he had room to expect. When there was no other difficulty, the States writ him a very submissive Letter, and at the same time sent full powers to the Marquis del Fresno, the Spanish Ambassador at London, to conclude a peace in their name, on the conditions already offered, but rejected by the King, on pretence they were only designed to amuse him. These proposals were so reasonable, and offered in so solemn a manner, that they could not be rejected without alarming the whole Kingdom, and confirming the suspicions, which were too general, that this war was not designed for the advantage of the People. Besides, the King's affairs required a speedy peace (6).

Presently after the receipt of the States letter, the King came to the Parliament the 24th of January, and communicated to both Houses the offers from the Dutch, desiring their advice on this affair. They answered, that it was their opinion, his Majesty should proceed in a treaty with the States, in order to a speedy peace. From that time, all difficulties relating to the peace were removed, in the conferences between the Marquis del Fresno, and the King's commissioners (7), and the treaty was concluded in a fortnight (8).

In this short interval, the Commons proceeded to take 673-4. into consideration the grievances of the nation. They insisted chiefly upon keeping an army composed of regular troops, and after a vote that it was a grievance to the Kingdom, they resolved to address the King for disbanding all forces raised since the year 1663. The examination of this affair gradually led them to that of the Horse and Foot guards, established by the King without the concurrence or approbation of the Parliament. It was found, that they were of vast charge to the King and Kingdom: That they were a standing army in disguise, which might be easily augmented: That guards were only in use in arbitrary Governments: that they were altogether useless, as appeared from the King's daily trusting his person to his people without a guard.

This debate was interrupted by the King's coming to the House of Peers, the 11th of February. The Commons being sent for, the King communicated to both Houses, that he had signed the peace with the Dutch. He told them moreover, in answer to their address concerning the Forces, that he had given orders for disbanding even more than were desired, and for sending back the Irish regiments. He added, that he must needs acquaint them, that there was a great want of capital ships, and he should be glad to be equal in number with his neighbours: He hoped therefore to have their assistance on such an occasion, to preserve the honour and safety of the nation. The Houses thanked him for the peace he had made, and for his gracious answer to their address.

This however was not capable to induce the Commons to suspend their debates upon the grievances. They voted, that a committee should be appointed to inspect the laws "lately made in Scotland, whereby, an army is authorized to march into England or Ireland, by the sole direction of the Council of Scotland; and peruse such other laws as tend to the breach of the union of the two nations." They likewise in a grand committee resolved, that a committee should be appointed to inspect the state and condition of Ireland, more especially with regard to Religion, the Militia, and the forces of that Kingdom. They moreover appointed another committee, "To inspect the laws, and to consider how the King might commit any Subject by his immediate warrant as the laws, then stood; and to report their opinions;" and further, "They were to consider how the law then stood touching the committing of persons by the Council-table, and to report the same." Upon this occasion they ordered a particular Bill to be brought in, concerning writs of Habeas Corpus, which was read three times, and passed the House. A Bill was likewise ordered to be brought in for a Telf to be taken by the members of both Houses.

It was a great mortification to the King to see the Commons so rigorously examining his conduct; for all their resolutions, in this session, pointed to the former proceedings of the Court. It may well be thought, that, as the project of the Cabal was to render the King absolute, and advance the interests of Popery, the King and his Ministers had not been very scrupulous to gain first one point, and then another, in order to establish precedents, and put the King in possession of arbitrary power, in things which were not equally obvious to all. As the Commons proceeded, it appeared plainly, they were resolved not to omit any point. The King, therefore, to defeat their designs, made use of his constant method, and coming to the Parliament the 24th of February, prorogued it to the 10th of November following, before any Bill was ready for the royal assent. Thus ended the 13th session of this Parliament, after sitting six weeks and three days. The prorogation was afterwards continued, and lasted about fourteen months.

The peace was proclaimed the 28th of February in London, with much greater demonstrations of joy and satisfaction from the People, than the war had been two years before. The sole difference between this peace and that of Breda was, that the ships and vessels belonging to the States, whether single or in fleets, should strike the Flag, and lower their Top-sail to those of England (1), whether single or in fleets, provided they carried the King's Flag. Moreover the States were to pay the King eight hundred thousand patacoons at four payments, namely, two hundred thousand on the exchange of the ratifications, and the rest at three payments, within the space of three years. 1673-4 Thus the People of England discharged the expense of this war, and the King alone reaped the benefit (2).

The King finding himself freed from the cares of war, and the uneasiness caused by the Parliament, abandoned himself entirely to a soft, indolent, and effeminate life. The Duchess of Orleans his sister had brought him, at their interview at Dover, the daughter of a Gentleman of Bretagne, called de Queroualle, who commanded the King's affection beyond any of his Mistresses, and was created Duchess of Portsmouth. But his particular fondness for her did not prevent his having many others, by whom he had several children, educated with no small expence. In a word, not to dwell on what passed at a Court so corrupted as that of Charles II, I shall only say, that the King's mistresses had ingrossed the whole credit of the Court, and that he could refuse them nothing.

It does not appear, that France complained much of Charles for deserting her, in making a separate peace with the Dutch. This caused several Politicians to think, that the King of France had given a full consent to this peace, in order to make Charles Mediator between him and his enemies, whose number was greatly increased, since the last year. This suspicion is farther confirmed by Charles's offer of his mediation to the King of France, soon after his peace with the States, which he readily accepted, without the least repentment of what had been lately transacted.

When the King was assured that his mediation was accepted by France, he sent Sir William Temple into Holland to offer the same to the States. As their towns and provinces were now recovered, except Maastricht, and Grave, they passionately wished for peace. The only obstacle was, the interest of their allies, the Emperor, the Empire, and Spain, who having engaged in the war for their sake, could not be abandoned without extreme ingratitude. The only way to please them, was to bring things to a treaty, where they might find their satisfaction. So, without being much sollicit, they accepted the King of England's mediation. It is true, France, and the allies had already accepted that of the King of Sweden, who had used his endeavours to procure a peace by his Ambassadors at the Congress of Cologne. But since that congress was broken off by the forcible carrying away of Prince William of Furstenberg (3), the Swedes had rendered himself suspected to the allies, by discovering too much partiality to France. So the States were not displeased to find another mediator to renew the conferences, though they had no great reason to confide in the King of England. But they were desirous of peace, and such was the situation of the affairs of Europe, that another mediator was not easy to be found. Wherefore, it was more advantageous to accept him, than to have none at all, and lose the hope of ending the war. However this be, they so strongly solicited all the Princes their allies, that at last they were induced to accept the King of England's mediation. But there was a wide difference between agreeing upon a mediator, and concluding a peace. So many various interests to adjust, made it easy to foresee, that peace would be a very difficult work, besides the accidents which the continuation of the war might produce, and which would be too apt to alter the pretensions of the two parties. For instance, whilst a mediation of peace was talked of at the Hague, a battle was fought at Senef, which indeed decided nothing, but might have had great consequences, if victory had entirely declared for one of the armies (4). Moreover, the Prince of Orange took Grave in October.

I cannot forbear taking notice of a thing which became more publick afterwards, and of which I shall have occasion to speak more amply, namely, that, at the very time Charles performed the office of a mediator, he received from France an annual pension of one hundred thousand pounds Sterling. By this we may judge of his impartiality. Moreover it appears in Coleman's letters, the Duke of York's Secretary (5), some of which were writ this year, that there was a close union between the King of France, and the Duke of York, and that the latter entirely relied on the assistance of France for the execution of the project formed in favour of the English Papists. This manifestly shews, that Charles had not desisted from his first designs, and only waited a favorable opportunity to execute them,

(2) This Peace was signed at Westminster, Feb. 9. See Collect. of Treat. Tom. III. p. 280. —Barnet says, Lord Arlington pressed the Spanish Minister, to prevail with the States, and the Prince of Orange, to accept a Proposition for a Peace to be set on foot. And that it might have some show of a Peace both begged and bought, he persuaded, that a sum of money should be offered the King by the States, which should be made over by him to the Prince, for the payment of the debt he owed him. Rawleigh, the French Ambassador, pressed the King much to give his Parliament all satisfaction in points of Religion. The King answered him, it was not his Brother's folly (la folie de mon Frere), he would get out of all difficulties. In conclusion, the Prince of Orange brought the States to make applications to the King, in the style of those who begged peace, though it was visible they could have forced it, with the offer of two or three hundred thousand pounds for the expence of the war, p. 366, 367.

1674. when France, discharged from the burden of this present war, should be in a condition to grant him the necessary assistance.

The King replied to the Parliament, Edward.
During these transactions, the Papists of England were labouring to prevail with the King to dissolve a Parliament which was so opposite to them; this appears also in Coleman's letters. But the King did not think proper to take such a step so soon, which might have done him great prejudice, by exasperating the people, and from which he could reap no other advantage, than to procure some ease for the Papists. But this was not his principal view. For though he was a disguised Papist, he had so little zeal for Religion, that he was by no means inclined to hazard his temporal interests, in compliance to the Papists. He published therefore, on the contrary, a Proclamation, to stifle the false report that the Parliament would quickly be dissolved, and to satisfy the People that the thing had never come under deliberation.

My.
E. 10.
III. p. 11.
To finish the events of this year 1674, I shall only take notice of some particulars which may be of use for the sequel. In September, the Earl of Arlington was made Lord-Chamberlain of the King's Household, and Sir Joseph Williamson, who had been Plenipotentiary at the Congress of Cologne, was made Secretary in his room. On the other hand, the Duke of Buckingham, who had been the King's principal favorite, lost his favor and credit to such a degree, that the King, without any ceremony, gave him a public affront, in declaring his office of Chancellor of Cambridge vacant, and in influencing the election in favor of his natural son the Duke of Monmouth.

The Earl of Clarendon died this year at Rouen in the 67th year of his age, after a seven years exile; during which he digested the Memoirs he had collected to compose his History of the Rebellion and Civil Wars of England. The famous John Milton, Author of the Poem called Paradise lost, died also this year (1).

1674-5. Of the five members of the Cabal, only the Earl of Arlington, and the Duke of Lauderdale remained about the King. The first finding himself in a very disagreeable situation, since the Parliament had so openly declared against him, believed, he had no other way to support himself, than by taking, or pretending to take measures opposite to those of which the Cabal was accused. Accordingly, he was the first who advised the King to call in his declaration for Liberty of Conscience, and when he saw the Parliament acting with such vigor to break the measures of the Court, he affected an extraordinary zeal for the Protestant Religion. He was constant at Sermons and Sacraments, and carried his dissimulation so far, as to persecute the Papists, whom he had till now protected.

Edward.
Some even say, he advised the King to remove the Duke of York from his Court. But if, by these proceedings, he gained any favour with the People, he lost more with the King and Duke, who no longer confided in him as before. The King had particularly shewn, he was displeased with him, by giving the Treasurer's Staff to Sir Thomas Osborne, afterwards Earl of Danby, which had ever been Arlington's ambition. This rendered the two Earls mortal Enemies to each other, and caused them to labour one another's destruction. The Earl of Arlington, seeing that his enemy daily gained ground upon him, imagined he might recover his former credit and favour by performing a signal service for the King; which was, to engage the Prince of Orange to enter into the measures of the English Court, for procuring such a peace as was desired by the Courts of France and England. As his Counsellors was Mr. Odyck's sister, who was much in the Prince's confidence, he imagined, that with the assistance of Odyck, and his other relations and friends, it would be easy to succeed in the scheme he had projected. Wherefore, he obtained the King's leave to go to the Hague to execute his design. But as he was ignorant of the temper, humour and character of the Prince of Orange, he took the very course to gain him which he should have avoided. He endeavoured to vindicate all the Proceedings of the Cabal and English Court, by reasons so weak and opposite to the truth, that he seemed in his discourse to the Prince, to think he had to deal with a child, ignorant of the most common affairs, which could not but offend him. But what offended him, was, that he attempted to draw him into a discovery of the English Lords, with whom he had held a secret correspondence during the last war. In a word, this journey proved so unsuccessful, that he lost not only the Prince of Orange's esteem, but all his credit with the King.

Edward.
Besides, he farther incurred the Duke of York's hatred, by proposing to the Prince, without any order, as it is said, a marriage with the Princess Mary, the Duke's eldest daughter, which was afterwards accomplished. It seems, the Duke foresaw how fatal that marriage would be to him. After the Earl's return to Court, his credit declined so visibly, and the King shewed it so openly, that the Courtiers made no scruple to mimic him in his presence, for the King's diversion. Thus had the Earl of Clarendon been used. It is said, that Colonel Talbot, afterwards Earl of Tyrconnel, having been some time absent from Court, and upon his return happening to see the Earl of Arlington one day acted by a person with a black patch on his nose, and a White-Staff in his hand, could not forbear reproaching the King with his ingratitude, in suffering a man to be thus unworthily treated, who had served him so faithfully, as well in his exile, as since his restoration; to which the King in his excuse replied, that he had no reason to be satisfied with the Earl's conduct: For, not content to come to Prayers as others did, he must be constant at Sacraments too. Why, answered Talbot, does not your Majesty do the very same thing? God's Fifth! replied the King with some heat, I hope there is a difference between Harry Bennet and Me.

This shews, the King had changed neither inclination nor principles since his designs had appeared to be ruin'd. The truth is, he was not satisfied with the members of the Cabal, tho' it was not for their counsels, but their not having pursued the general design with sufficient ability. Sir William Temple in his Memoirs, relates, that before he departed to offer the King's mediation to the States, he endeavoured, in a private audience, to make the King sensible how ill-advised, and how ill-served he had been by the Cabal; to which the King answered-----It is true, I have succeeded ill, but if I had been well served, I might have made a good business enough of it: and so proceeded to justify what was past. The King is therefore to be considered at the time I am speaking of, that is, during the fourteen months interval between the two sessions, as waiting a favourable opportunity for the better executing his designs. And this opportunity was not to be found till France should be at peace with her enemies, and in a condition to assist her secret ally. In the mean time, the King seems to have had no other business, than to get as much money as he could from his Parliament. He began therefore, according to custom, with publishing a Proclamation against Popish Priests and Jesuits to prepare the Parliament to be favourable to him.

The fourteenth session of this Parliament began the 13th of April. The King opened it with a speech to both Houses, in which he told them-----That the principal end of his calling them now, was to know what they thought might yet be wanting to the security of Religion and property, and to give himself the satisfaction of having used his utmost endeavours to procure and settle a right understanding between him and his Parliament-----For he must tell them, that he found the contrary was so much laboured, and the pernicious designs of ill men had taken so much place under specious pretences, that it was high time to be watchful in preventing their contrivances; of which this was not the least, that they endeavoured, by all means they could devile, to make it impracticable any longer to continue this present Parliament-----That he had done as much on his part as was possible to extinguish the fears and jealousies of Popery; and would leave nothing undone that might heat the World his zeal to the Protestant Religion as established in the Church of England, from which he would never depart. He then recommended the condition of the fleet, which he was not able, he said, to put into that state it ought to be, and which required a considerable sum of money as well to repair as to build. Lastly, he told them, that the season of the year would not permit a long session-----That he intended to meet them again the next winter, and in the mean time recommended to them all such temper and moderation in their proceedings, as might tend to unite him and them in council and affections, and disapprove the expectations of those, who could only hope by violent and irregular motions to prevent the bringing the session to a happy conclusion.

The Commons thanked the King for his Speech and promises to preserve their Religion and Liberties: but as he had given them only Proclamations, the little efficacy of which was well known, they believed them insufficient, and accordingly proceeded to a new Bill against the growth of Popery, and particularly Popish Priests, that is, such as had received orders from the See of Rome.

This done, the Commons presented a long address against the Duke of Lauderdale, in which they said,-----That upon a serious examination of the state of the Kingdom, they found, that some persons in great employment under his Majesty, had fomented designs contrary to the interest of both his Majesty and his People, intending to deprive them of their ancient Rights and Liberties, amongst which was the Duke of Lauderdale.

(1) He was Latin Secretary to the Long Parliament, and afterwards to Oliver Cromwell himself.

"dale (1), (this was clearly pointing at the Cabal.) That he had openly affirmed in the presence of his Majesty sitting in Council, and before divers of his Subjects attending there, That his Majesty's edicts ought to be obeyed; for his edicts are equal with Laws, and ought to be obeyed in the first place. They then represented to his Majesty some Acts which had been made by the Parliament of Scotland, by which it appeared, that there was a Militia settled in that Kingdom of twenty thousand Foot, and two thousand Horse, who are obliged to be in a readiness to march into any part of this Kingdom, for any service wherein his Majesty's honour, authority, and greatness may be concerned; and are to obey such orders and directions, as they shall from time to time receive from the Privy-Council there, and that the Duke of Lauderdale was the promoter of this Act. That by this means England was exposed to an invasion from Scotland under any pretence whatsoever, while the Duke of Lauderdale was intrusted with the administration of that Kingdom. For these reasons, they humbly besought his Majesty to remove the said Duke for ever from his person and council." The King did not think proper to grant this request, and gave some reasons for his refusal, which were not satisfactory to the Commons. And therefore they resolved to prepare a second address against the Duke.

The Earl of Danby's conduct examined by the Commons. Echard. lib. p. 378. Burnet.

The Commons, after attacking the old members of the Cabal, proceeded against a new one, namely, the Lord-Treasurer Danby, who was believed to be deeply engaged in the design of making the King absolute. They examined his whole conduct since his admission to his high post, and drew up several articles, in which they accused him of great misdemeanours. In one of these articles, he was accused of saying at the hearing of a cause in the Treasury-Chamber, That a new Proclamation is better than an old act. But as sufficient proofs were not found to support the charge, it was dropped.

It may be easily inferred from these proceedings of the Commons, that they were extremely jealous of the King and his Ministers, and did not doubt of the Court's intention to introduce Popery, and invade the Liberties of the Subject. Those who would wholly ascribe the ill humour of the Commons to Shaftsbury's influences, can hardly answer the above-mentioned facts, which would not be less true, though the Earl of Shaftsbury had never been born.

The King is affected by the Commons to call home his forces from France, which he refused. Echard.

The Commons showed also their distrust in another point which was no less grievous to the King. By an address they prayed him to recall his troops out of France, and prevent his Subjects from engaging in that service for the future. The King rejected the first part of the address, on pretence that, in the treaty concluded with the States, he had not engaged to recall those troops, and that it could not be done without prejudice to the peace, which he now enjoyed with all his neighbours: but by a Proclamation he prohibited his Subjects from entering into the service of France.

The Lords afraid that the Commons are going too far. Kennet. p. 332. Echard.

Whilst the Commons were thus proceeding with vigour, and giving on all occasions signal marks of their distrust, the Lords remained idle, and seemed regardless of the fears and jealousies expressed by the Commons. Nay, some, and particularly the Bishops, observing that the Commons were gradually departing from the principle which had been established by this same Parliament, as well concerning the Church of England, as the royal authority, feared, they would lean too much to the opposite side. At the beginning of this Parliament, whilst it was believed that the King was and ever would be a protector of the Church of England, and would give continual proofs of his affection for a People who had so generously restored him, it was thought the royal authority could not be carried too high, nor too many precautions taken against the Non-conformists. But the face of things being changed, and the King having shewn by his conduct since he was on the throne, that he really designed to introduce Popery, and render himself absolute, these same principles, which had been considered as a bulwark to defend both Church and State, appeared too apt to countenance the designs ascribed to the King and his Ministers, of invading the Government and the established Religion. The Commons therefore seeing, the King was not the person he was thought to be, and that he took advantage of the Acts made in his favour to advance his own interests, which were not those of the nation, used all possible precautions to hinder the execution of his designs. These precautions went so far, that the House of Lords were at last apprehensive, that the Commons intended to overturn every thing established concerning the royal prerogative and the Church's security, and that by degrees the nation would again become Republican and Presbyterian. It is pretended, the Bishops were all or most of them of this opinion. To prevent an evil which to them appeared very dangerous, [Robert Bartu] Earl of Lindsay brought into the House of Lords a Bill, intitled, An Act to prevent the dangers which may arise from persons disaffected to the Government. By this Bill all persons who enjoyed any office ecclesiastical, civil, or military, all Privy-Counsellors and members of Parliament, were obliged, under a penalty, to take the oath which had been introduced first in the Corporation-Act, then in the Militia-Act, and afterwards more fully in the five-mile-Act. The oath, to save the Reader the trouble of looking for it elsewhere, was thus expressed, I do declare that it is not lawful upon any pretence whatsoever to take up arms against the King; and that I do abhor the traitorous position of taking arms by his authority against his person, or against those that are commissioned by him, in pursuance of such commission: And I do swear, that I will not at any time endeavour the alteration of the Government either in Church or State. So help me God.

When this oath was inserted in the three forementioned Acts, it produced no considerable debate, for the reasons I have been speaking of; but the case was very different when it was proposed in this session. First, because it was rendered in a manner universal, since it was extended to all persons in any office whatever, and even to Privy-counsellors and members of Parliament. Secondly, because the times were altered, and most men had not the same opinion of the King, as when the three former Acts were made. This Bill occasioned debates in the Upper-House, which lasted seventeen days, without a possibility of coming to any conclusion (2). There were two powerful parties in the House, one for, and the other against the Bill, and the votes of the Bishops turned the scale on the side of the first. This appeared, in that notwithstanding all the efforts of the opposers of the Bill, to hinder its being referred to a Committee, they could not succeed. Whereupon some Lords of that party entered their protestation against it (3). The same thing happened, when the Bill came to be examined in a Committee of the whole House. In fine, with regard to the substance of the Bill, the two parties displayed all their art and eloquence, the one for the passing, and the other for the rejecting it. In general, those who argued for the Bill maintained, that the position of taking up arms by the King's authority against his person, or against those that are commissioned by him, was false and pernicious; and they supported their opinion by instances of what had been done in the last reign, where it caused such great disorders, and occasioned the subversion both of Church and State. They said therefore, that the Kingdom being still full of Fanatics, Republicans, and enemies of the Church, it was absolutely necessary to impose this oath upon them, to distinguish them, that it might be known who were to be guarded against. That, otherwise, there was danger of seeing one day renewed, the disorders which had reduced the Kingdom to so deplorable a condition, and that the oath enjoined by this Bill, was, a moderate security to the Church and Crown (4).

The other party maintained (5), "That the oath imposed by this, contained three clauses, the two first Assertory, and the last Promissory; that it was worthy the consideration of the Bishops, whether Assertory Oaths, which are properly appointed to give testimony of a matter of fact, of which a man is capable to be assured by the evidence of his senses, be lawful to be made use of to confirm or invalidate doctrinal Propositions; and whether that legislative power, which imposes such an oath, does not necessarily assume to itself an infallibility. And as to Promissory Oaths, it was desired, that the learned Prelates would consider the opinion of Gratius de jure Belli & Pacis, lib. 2. cap. 3. who seems to make it plain, that those kind of oaths are forbidden by

(2) The great Speakers for this Bill, were, the Lord-Treasurer, and the Lord-Keeper, with Bishop Morley, and Bishop Ward. The Speakers against it, were, the Duke of Buckingham, the Earl of Shaftsbury, the Lords Helles, and Halifax, and the Earl of Salisbury. Kennet, p. 332.

(3) The protesting Lords, who were looked upon as of the Country party, were, Buckingham, Bridgewater, Winchelsea, Salisbury, Bedford, Dorset, Ashley, Bristol, Gough, Pym, Elliot, Frow, Russell, Mohun, Stanford, Halifax, Delamare, Rye, Shaftsbury, Clarendon, Grey of Rallings, &c. &c. A North, Wharton. It must be observed, that this Bill was conceived by the Church party, and was disliked by the Duke, and the Papists in general, because it prevented the bringing any Test in practice, would certainly bring on one that would turn them out of the House.

(4) These were the Lord Chancellor's words.

(5) They said, There ought to be no Tests, beyond the oath of allegiance, upon the elections to Parliament: It being the great privilege of the House, that they were not to be taxed but by their Representatives; it was therefore thought a sinfulness in men of the main part of their birth right, to be obliged to give their assent to laws, which they were not to be taxed but by their Representatives; it was therefore thought dangerous, and contrary to public Liberty: A great well might, in shew, that the peace of the world was best secured by good Laws, and good Government; and that Oaths and Tests were no security: The first would be rendered by them: Yet the bulk of the world would boldly take any Test, and as boldly break through it. Burnet, p. 384.

"our Saviour Christ, Matt. v. 34, 37. And whether it would not become the Fathers of the Church, when they have well-weighed that and other places of the New Testament, to be more tender in multiplying oaths, than hitherto the great men of the Church have been?" But the question being put, the oath was voted by the majority of the House, the Bishops being all for it.

Then they proceeded to the particulars of the oath contained in the Bill, and it was alleged by the opposers, that the position of taking arms by the King's authority against his person, was true and necessary in a limited Government; like that of England, otherwise this would be to surrender the Rights and Liberties of the Subject, to a Prince, who being supposed a tyrant, (which was a very possible case) would not be restrained by the fear, either of God or Man. That should such a future King undertake to abolish all the Laws, and invade the Estates and Liberties of his Subjects, they would be obliged by this oath, not to resist him, but to submit to his yoke. That even without supposing such a tyranny, a King might happen to be made prisoner by his own Subjects, as was the case of Henry III. and Henry VI. and then those who should have the Sovereign in their hands, might act in his name, and authority, by virtue of his commissions, while the Subjects would be restrained by the obligation of this oath from endeavouring to free him from captivity. In short, several other probable cases were alleged, by which it was clearly proved, that the oath ought necessarily to have some restrictions, if it was not intended to surrender to the King all the Liberties of the nation. But as such restrictions were not easy to be expressed, they concluded, it was much better, to leave the oath in generals which should not comprehend all possible cases, as seemed to be the intention of this oath, from the terms in which it was conceived.

This affair was interrupted by an accident which raised a violent contest between the two Houses. I shall not relate the particulars, which suppose the knowledge of many things concerning the privileges of both Houses, which few foreigners are acquainted with. I shall content myself with briefly showing the occasion of it. One Dr. Shirley having brought an Appeal in the House of Lords, from a decree in Chancery, against Sir John Fagg, a member of the House of Commons, they ordered Shirley to be taken into the custody of the Sergeant at Arms for a breach of Privilege. The Warrant for taking Shirley into custody was forcibly taken from the Sergeant's deputy, by the Lord Mohun. The Commons demanded justice of the Peers against the Lord Mohun, and were answered by the Lords, that he had only done his duty. The quarrel thus begun, daily increased, so that the Houses, in their answers and replies, came to language so reproachful, that there was no hope of an accommodation (1). Wherefore the King came to the House of Peers the 9th of June, and prorogued the Parliament to the 13th of October. Thus ended the 14th session of this Parliament, before the Money-bill, and other publick Bills were ready for the royal assent. The Commons had designed to grant the King three hundred thousand pounds Sterling (2), but at the same time resolved to apply the ancient Tunnage and Poundage, to the maintenance of the navy, according to its original design, which amounted to four hundred thousand pounds a year. As the King would have been a real sufferer by such an appropriation, he was not sorry to have occasion to prorogue the Parliament, chusing rather to be deprived of a sum of three hundred thousand pounds, than lose a revenue of four hundred thousand.

During the Campaign of 1675, the King of France lost the famous Marshal Turenne, who had done him very great services. He was killed by a Cannon ball in an action not important in itself, but rendered so by the death of this General, his army being obliged to repass the Rhine. Their retreat facilitated the recovery of Treves to the allies, which was yet in the hands of the French. In the beginning of the year, the contending powers had agreed, after long negotiations, to treat of a peace in the City of Nimwegen. But nothing considerable was done this year.

In England, since the last session, there were some intrigues at Court to engage the King to dissolve the Parliament. The Presbyterians earnestly wished it, hoping that the people disaffected with the Court, would, as usually happens, chuse Representatives who had other principles than those of the present Parliament. The Papists had passionately desired this dissolution before the last session, but, as it appears in one of Coleman's letters of August this year, they had altered their mind, and expected much from this very Parliament which had hitherto been so adverse to them. But it is not seen on what this hope was founded. I shall hereafter speak of this and some other letters of Coleman, in which it evidently appears, that the Papists were at this time very active to procure great advantages to their Religion, and relied much on the Duke of York, and the assistance of France.

The 13th of October the King opened the 15th session of this Parliament with a very short Speech, in which, after recommending union to both Houses, and the interests of the Church of England, he demanded money, as well for building ships, as for taking off the anticipations upon his revenues, desiring them to remember, it was now above three years since he had asked any thing of them for his own private use.

Then the Lord-Keeper made a speech full of flattery to the King, in which he endeavoured to show, that no King had ever a more sincere affection for his Subjects, or laboured with more zeal for the preservation of Religion and liberty, and therefore it was not to be doubted, but they would behave themselves like those that deserved to be called the King's friends, and that they would put him at ease too.

But the Commons, instead of being moved by so unreasonable a Rhetoric, and by such ill-grounded reasons, refused the consideration of the Bills left unfinished the last session, for the liberty of the Subject, and added others for its better security.

Afterwards they took into consideration the sums granted to the King for the last war, and the expences of the same, and found, that the charges amounted to a million less than the Receipt, and without being able to discover to what uses this million had been applied (3).

In the report made of this affair, it was said, that the Parliament was not obliged to pay the King's private debts by a tax, for if this pretension was admitted, they would have to pay the like debts about a year and half hence, and so encourage the Court to exact yearly a million and a half, as they had hitherto done: That since the end of the war, the whole charge of the Government, both by sea and land, amounted not to above seven hundred thousand pounds Sterling, and the clear income of the revenue came at least to sixteen hundred thousand, and consequently there ought to have been a yearly remainder of near a million: And yet the King had anticipated his revenues near a million more, to pay which, would be to entail perpetual anticipations upon the Kingdom, to its utter ruin and desolation. The Parliament therefore resolved to grant the King nothing for taking off these anticipations. Nevertheless, a few days after they voted a supply of three hundred thousand pounds Sterling for the building of twenty large ships of war (4), but withal resolved to appropriate Tunnage and Poundage to the use of the Navy, which could not but be very disagreeable to the King.

Then the Commons proceeded to examine the trade with France, and found, that the French imported yearly into England commodities to the value of a million more than they exported, upon which a Bill was ordered to be prepared.

Lastly, the Commons being informed of a publick report, That many of their Members were Pensioners to the Court, resolved to oblige all their Members to take an oath, by which they were to profess, that they had not received any money from the Court, since the 1st of January 1672. But I know not whether this resolution was executed (5).

The debates of the Commons were a little interrupted, by a report made to the House of the influence of a French Jesuit named St. Germain. This Jesuit being informed, that one Luzancy a French Priest had embraced the Pro-could obtain (1). For the Court of France, knowing that Charles would not break with them for fifty-three ships belonging to private men, took no notice of these complaints. The King's indolence produced at least this effect, that the people of England, enraged to see themselves thus exposed to the piracies of the French, were extremely desirous of a war with France, in order to be revenged, and impatiently waited the meeting of the Parliament, in the belief that both Houses would be more careful, than the King, of the interests of the nation.

The remaining part of this year afforded nothing memorable, besides a Proclamation published by the King, forbidding his Subjects to hear Mass in the Queen's Chappel in Somerset House, or in the Houses of Ambassadors. These Proclamations were always expressed in very rigorous terms; but executed with such negligence, that the frequency of them only served to show, how little desirous the King was to have his orders strictly observed. They were usually a preparative to the next session, but during the intervals of Parliament, the Romish Priests and Jesuits, who swarmed in the Kingdom, and all other Papists, were sure of impunity.

This year died George Digby Earl of Bristol in the sixty-fifth year of his age, who has often been remembered in the course of this History (2).

The King, as I said, had prorogued the Parliament for fifteen months, except a few days. This prorogation, the longest that ever was known, raised a doubt, whether by it the Parliament was not actually dissolved. This doubt was owing to a Statute of Edward III. never repealed, whereby it was enacted, that a Parliament should be held once every year, and often if occasion required. This dispute made a great noise in the Kingdom, and Books were published on both sides the question. In general the Court-Party maintained, that the Parliament was not dissolved, and the contrary party pretended it could not meet, after a fifteen months interruption. I believe the interest of neither party was herein much concerned, though perhaps some private persons might have found some advantage in a new Parliament.

The Parliament however met the 15th of February according to the prorogation. The King in his Speech to both Houses declared, "That he was prepared to give them all the satisfaction and security in the great concerns of the Protestant Religion as established in the Church of England, that should be reasonably asked, or could consist with Christian prudence. And he declared himself as freely, that he was ready to gratify them in a further security of their Liberty and Property, (if they could think it was wanted) by as many good Laws as they should propose, and as could consist with the safety of the Government, without which there could be neither liberty nor property left to any man." After this, reckoning he had given both Houses entire satisfaction, he told them, "That he expected and required from them, that all occasions of differences between the two Houses should be carefully avoided.---In the next place, he desired them to consider the necessity of building more ships, and how much all their safeties were concerned in it.---And as they knew him to be under a great burden of debts, he hoped, they would not deny him the continuance of the additional revenue of Excise, which was near expiring.---And, that they might be satisfied how impolitable it was (whatever some men thought) to support the Government with less than the present revenue, they might at any time see the yearly established charge, by which it would appear, that the constant and unavoidable charge being paid, there would remain no overplus towards the discharging those contingencies which might happen in all Kingdoms, and which had been a considerable charge to him the last year."

Then the Chancellor enlarged upon all these points; but as his Speech was wholly founded upon this unquestionable truth, according to him, that the King had only the welfare of his people in view; I shall transcribe only this single passage.---"For the King hath no desires but what are publick, no ends or aims which terminate in himself; all his endeavours are so entirely bent upon the welfare of his whole Dominions, that he doth not think any man a good Subject, who doth not heartily love his Country: And therefore let no man pass for a good Patriot, who doth not heartily love and serve his Prince. Private men indeed are subject to be misled by private interests, and may entertain some vain and slender hopes of surviving the publick; but a Prince is sure to fall with it, and therefore can never have any interests divided from it. To live and die with the King, is the highest profession a Subject can make, and some times it is profession only and no more; but in a King it is an absolute necessity, it is a fate inevitable, that he must live and die with his people. Away then with the vain imaginations of those who infuse a misbelief of the Government; away with all those ill-meant distinctions between the Court and the Country, between the natural and the political Capacity; and let us all who go about to perfwade others, that there are several interests, have a care of that precipice, to which such principles may lead them."

As soon as the Commons were withdrawn, the Duke of Buckingham stood up in the House of Lords, and made a speech very long speech, to prove, that the Parliament was dissolved by the last prorogation. He grounded his opinion upon ancient Statutes, (which, he said, are not like women, the worse for being old,) and chiefly upon the Statute of Edward III. namely, That a Parliament should be holden every year once, and more often, if need be. He added, "though these words are as plain as a pike-staff, and no man living, that is not a Scholar, can possibly mistake their meaning, yet the Grammarians in those days made a shift to explain, that the words, if need be, related as well to the words, every year once, as to the words, more often, and so by this grammatical whimsey of theirs, have made this Statute to signify nothing. For this reason in the 36th year of the same reign, a new Act of Parliament was made, in which those unfortunate words, if need be, are left out, and that Act, relating to Magna Charta, and other Statutes, made good. Here now, my Lords, there is not left the least colour for any mistake, for it is plainly declared, That the Kings of England must call a Parliament once within a year." Then he reduced the whole matter to this dilemma. "Either the Kings are bound by these Acts, or else the Government of England by Parliaments is at an end. For if the Kings have power, by an order of theirs, to invalidate an Act made for the maintenance of Magna Charta, they have also power, by an order of theirs, to invalidate Magna Charta itself". It appears by the sequel of this speech, that the Duke of Buckingham's aim was to put an end to this Parliament, which had continued so long, and thereby rendered the Commons, in some measure, sovereigns over their Countrymen. The Duke was seconded by the Earls of Salisbury and Shafsbury, and the Lord Wharton. At last, after great debates, the House sent all four to the Tower (3), from whence they were shortly after released, except the Earl of Shafsbury, who was continued there above a year, because he would not own the justice of his imprisonment (4).

A few days after, the Commons voted the King a Tax of five hundred and eighty-four thousand pounds, to build thirty ships, without appropriating Tonnage and Poundage. Besides, they continued for three years the additional tax upon beer, which was to expire the 24th of June.

It appeared soon after, that their grand affair was to stop the great progress of France in the Netherlands, and engage the King in a war with that Kingdom, for which purpose they presented the following Address:

"We your Majesty's most loyal Subjects, do most humbly offer to your Majesty's consideration, that the minds of your people are much disquieted with the manifest dangers arising to your Majesty, by the growth and power of the French King, especially by the acquisitions already made, and the farther progress like to be made by him in the Spanish Netherlands, in the preservation and security whereof we humbly conceive the interest of your Majesty, and the safety of your people, are highly concerned; and therefore we humbly beseech your Majesty to take the same into your royal care, and to strengthen your self with such stricter alliances, as may secure your Majesty's Kingdoms, and secure and preserve the said Spanish Netherlands, and thereby quiet the minds of your Majesty's people." To which the King thus answered,---"That he was of the opinion of his two Houses of Parliament, that the preservation of Flanders was of great consequence; and that he would use all means in his power for the safety of his Kingdom."

This answer not being satisfactory, the House presented a second Address on the same subject the 30th of March, 1667.

3. The two Earls, upon having leave to have their own servants wait on them, named their Cooks first, which the King highly resented, as carrying in dishonour to the Crown.

4. The Earl of Shafsbury, it seems, had reflected on the Duke of Buckingham, as a man inconstant and glibly in his conduct. As the Duke was taking a walk, on his discharge out of the Tower, the Earl looking out of his window, cried, Woe to my Lord, are you going to leave us? Yes, my Lord, replied the Duke, and my good fellows as I can never fly long in a place. Burnet, 3. p. 416.

1677. It was much the same with the first, excepting the addition, that in case his Majesty should happen to be engaged in a war with France, they should always be ready to assist him with such supplies, as might enable him to prosecute the same with success.

The King gave no answer to this address till twelve days after, when he sent a message, "that the only way to prevent the dangers which might arise in these Kingdoms, would be to put him timely in a condition to make such fitting preparations, as might enable him to do what should be most for their security."

This drew from the Commons a third address to the King, in which they informed him, that they were preparing a Bill for the additional duty of Excise, on which he might borrow two hundred thousand pounds, and promised to give him ample testimony of their affection at their next meeting, after a short recess during Easter. The King not satisfied with so small a sum, told them plainly, that without six hundred thousand pounds, it would not be possible for him to answer the ends of their several addresses.

Many members being absent on account of the expected adjournment at Easter, the Commons were cautious of proceeding upon other Money-bills; but desired his Majesty's leave to adjourn, promising, that, after the recess, they would comply with his demands. The same day, the 16th of April, the King came to the House of Peers, and gave his assent to several Acts. The chief were, an Act for the raising of five hundred, and eighty-four thousand pounds Sterling, for building of thirty ships. 2. An Act for an additional Excise upon Beer, and other Liquors, for three years. 3. An Act for prevention of frauds and perjuries. 4. An Act for taking away the writ de Heretico Comburendo. 5. An Act for erecting a Judicature to determine differences touching Houses burnt by the late dreadful fire in Southwark (1). Then the Chancellor acquainted the two Houses, that the King gave them leave to adjourn to the 21st of May next.

The King, undoubtedly, had no desire to begin a war with France, his private engagements with Lewis being too strong to allow him such a thought. However, he improved the present occasion to draw money from his Parliament, on pretence of providing for the safety of the nation. For that was all he had yet obliged himself to, tho' the Commons imagined, he was ready to come into their measures, as soon as he should be assured of a supply. The vigour with which the Commons acted, was owing to the progress of Lewis in the Netherlands, and on the Rhine, while Charles, plunged in pleasures, remained unconcerned, and by his conduct effectually destroyed the principles established by his Chancellor, that it was impossible for the King and Kingdom to have opposite interests. The 17th of March, the King of France took Valenciennes, and besieged Cambrai, while St. Omer was invested by the Duke of Orleans. Cambrai cost him but seven days, and while he besieged the citadel, the Prince of Orange marched to the relief of St. Omer, and was overcome by the Duke of Orleans at Montcaisel. After this defeat, the citadel of Cambrai, and St. Omer, surrendered by capitulation, about the 20th of April. By this means the Spanish Netherlands were open on all sides, and could be preserved, but by the assistance of England. This was clearly seen by the Commons, and excited their endeavours to awaken the King out of his affected lethargy. The King knew the danger as well as, or better than, his Parliament. But, contrary to the maxim of his Chancellor, the Kingdom's danger was not his. The more powerful the King of France rendered himself, the greater was his private advantage, because it was by the assistance of France, that he pretended to enslave his own Kingdom. Let a man study never so much to find plausible reasons for the King's conduct and negligence, with regard to the Netherlands, and the growing power of France, he will find none, without supposing what I have said concerning the King's designs. The Spaniards, and Dutch, the Emperor and the Princes of Germany, all reasoned wrong. They supposed, that Charles would not suffer the Netherlands to be lost, because it was the interest of England to preserve them, and were mistaken in imagining, the King would be influenced by the good of his Kingdom. But he had a particular interest directly contrary to that of England, namely, his own, which he blindly pursued. He would have seen the last town of the Spanish Netherlands lost without being moved. Nevertheless, as it was also his interest not to discover his designs before the time, for fear of alarming the English, and engaging the Parliament in other measures, he pretended to approve of their views. But this was only to obtain a supply, without promising however any thing but to make preparations, which properly was obliging himself to nothing at all. Such was the King's conduct in this whole affair, as will appear still more plainly in the sequel.

The Parliament meeting the 21st of May, by the King's command. proclamation of summons, after an adjournment of near five weeks, the Commons believed the King had spent this interval in making the alliances they had desired, and that he would communicate to them what had been done. But the King only told them, by Secretary Coventry, that he expected the House would forthwith proceed to the money-bill, and the rather, because he intended there should be a recess very quickly. This message occasioned warm debates in the House. They were inclined to give the King the six hundred thousand pounds he had asked, but were willing to have something for their money, whereas the King was for being sure of the supply before he proceeded in what was desired by the Commons. Their distrust was not very honourable to him, but it was his fault, because he had given so many occasions for it, and therefore he could not think it strange. He made it however subservient to his design, and pretended in his turn to fear, that the Commons intended to engage him in a war with France, and then leave him to extricate himself as well as he could, without granting the necessary assistance to support it. On this pretence he sent for the Commons to Whitehall, and made then the following Speech.

"Gentlemen, I have sent for you hither, that I might prevent those mistakes and distrusts, which I find some are ready to make, as if I had called you together only to get money from you, for other uses than you would have it employed. I do assure you on the word of a King, that you shall not repent any trust you repose in me, for the safety of my Kingdoms, and I desire you to believe, I would not break my credit with you; but as I have already told you, That it will not be possible for me to speak or act those things which should answer the ends of your several addresses, without exposing my Kingdoms to much greater dangers, so I declare to you again, I will neither hazard my own safety nor yours, until I be in a better condition than I am able to put my self, both to defend my Subjects, and offend my enemies. I do farther assure you, I have not lost one day since your last meeting, in doing all I could for your defence, and I tell you plainly, it shall be your fault, and not mine, if your security be not sufficiently provided for."

As this Speech, under general and obscure terms, perfectly answered the King's secret intentions, it is absolutely necessary to make some remarks, in order to shew distinctly and plainly, both the King's intention and character.

First, the Commons had desired the King to provide for the safety of his Kingdoms, upon the foundation, that their safety depended on the preservation of the Spanish Netherlands. But the King says not a word which may oblige him to the defence of the Netherlands, and contents himself with promising, upon his royal word, that he will provide for the safety of his Kingdom; which general promise left him room to say afterwards, that whatever he had done was for the safety of his Kingdom.

Secondly, he supposed, that in providing for this safety, his Kingdoms would be exposed to great dangers, unless he had the money beforehand, which was a groundless supposition.

Thirdly, he told them, he ought to be put in a better condition to defend his Subjects, and offend his enemies. By this last expression he insinuated, that he would enter into a league offensive against France, which was not his intention, as will hereafter plainly appear.

Fourthly, he told them, he had not lost one day in doing all he could for their defence, which expression signified nothing, since he had just told them, he could neither speak nor act, before he had the demanded supply. In what therefore did his five weeks care consist?

Fifthly, there is but one thing clear in this speech, and that is, he would be sure of the money before he began to act. By which he intimated to the Commons, that he pretended to have as much reason to distrust them, as they could have to distrust him, though assuredly the case was very different.

This Speech occasioned very great debates in the House of Commons. The Court-party proposed a speedy grant of the desired supply, to enable the King to make alliances, otherwise, they could not be expected to be made; and alledged, that the King had the same power of making war and leagues, as the House had in giving money; he could not have money without them, nor they alliances without him. The contrary party remarked, that nothing positive was promised by the King, except that he would provide for the safety of the Kingdom, which might Prince by several of them during the late war. The King having heard him with great attention, answered, "I never yet was deceived in judging a man's honesty by his looks, — and if I am not deceived in the Prince's face, he is the honestest man in the world; and I will trust him, and he shall have his wife, and you shall go immediately and tell my brother so, and that it is a thing I am resolved on." The Duke of York appeared at first a little surprized, but however answered, the King should be obeyed, and he should be glad his Subjects would learn from him the obedience which they owed to their Sovereign, — adding, I tell him my opinion very freely upon any thing, but when that is done, and I know his pleasure upon it, I obey him. Immediately after Sir William waited on the Prince with the agreeable news. The same day, the marriage-articles were drawn and agreed, the Princess's portion being forty thousand pound Sterling, and the day after the King declared the marriage in full Council (1). The city of London testified an extraordinary joy at the news, and Sir Francis Chaplin the Lord-Mayor invited the King to a magnificent entertainment the 29th of October. The marriage was consummated on the Prince's birth-day, the 4th of November (2).

A few days after, the King, the Duke of York, the Prince of Orange, the Lord-Treasurer, and Sir William Temple, entered into conference for settling the scheme of a general peace, and after some debates, agreed upon these terms: "All should be restored by France to the Emperor, that had been taken from him in the war, the Duchy of Lorrain to that Duke, and all on both sides between France and Holland: And to Spain, the towns of Aeth, Charlemy, Oudenard, Courtray, Tournay, Conde, Valenciennes, St. Guilain, and Binch. That the Prince of Orange should endeavour to procure the consent of Spain; and the King that of France, for which purpose he should send some person immediately over with the proposition, who was to demand a positive answer in two days." The Lord Duras, afterwards Earl of Feversham, a creature of the Duke of York, was the person fixed upon to execute this commission.

The Prince and Princess of Orange embarked for Holland shortly after. The King positively assured the Prince, he would never depart from the scheme agreed upon for a general peace, and that if France refused her consent, he would declare war against her. And yet, the Prince had the mortification before his departure, to see the adjournment of the Parliament prolonged from the 3d of December to the 4th of April (3).

The Court of France were extremely surprized, as well with the scheme of the peace, as the manner in which it was pretended to impose it on them. But whether the Lord Duras had secret orders to give hopes, that the scheme might be altered, or it was not designed to gain the King of England, the Envoy, after staying some days beyond his commission, returned without an answer, or at least with an answer of no signification. It contained only, That the most Christian King hoped, his brother would not break with him upon one or two towns, to which England had no pretension, but however, he would send orders to his Ambassador at London, to treat with his Majesty himself. It is known, the King of France offered Mr. Montague, the English Ambassador, large sums for the King, and the Treasurer, which were not accepted, at least openly; but on the other hand, the King suffered himself to be mollified by the offers or articles of France, that the scheme of peace agreed on with the Prince of Orange, was at last reduced to nothing, and no more heard of.

From the Lord Duras's return, to the meeting of the Parliament, the King was actually negotiating with the King of France, the terms on which he was to resist the solicitations of his Parliament, and prevent his declaring for the allies. This appeared openly in the Parliament itself, by the letters of the Lord-Treasurer Danby, produced before the Commons in 1678, by Mr. Montague, Ambassador at the French Court; and since that, a fuller conviction has been given of this by Mr. Montague's letters, published by the Earl of Danby, in the reign of William III. I shall transcribe the extracts of these letters, that the reader may be satisfied of what I say, without relying on my word. But I am to premise, that the King, after prolonging the adjournment to April 1678, thought proper to assemble the Parliament, the 15th of January, and as soon as they met, to adjourn the Commons, by a message, to the 28th of the same month. The letters I mentioned were as follows:

Extract of a Letter from Mr. Montague to the King from Paris, in the year 1677.

"I Am sure, the greatness of the King of France is supported only by your Majesty's connivance at what he does, and the good will Christendom sees you have for him. The advantage he has by it even in point of Revenue, by his conquests, does amount to five times the sum you have now from him: And though after-games are hard to play, I think I understand this Court so well, and if you care to have it done, I am confident I could get you by agreement a million of Livres a year to be paid while the war lasts, and four millions after the peace shall be made, I mean, Sir, over and above what you have from France now." —

Extract of a Letter from Mr. Montague to the Lord Treasurer Danby, writ a little after the former.

"Expect his Christian Majesty's answer to the demands I made by the King's direction of two hundred thousand pounds Sterling, to be paid till the general peace is concluded, taking for granted that it will be conform to my orders from the King, to insist upon two millions of Livres a year during the war, and four millions after the peace, or else two hundred thousand pounds Sterling during the war. But I am told this morning, that Mr. Courtin has agreed this matter with the King my master, and that his Majesty will be contented with two millions of Livres a year only during the war; which I confess surprized me extremely, considering the necessity of his Majesty's condition, and the positiveness of his commands to me, to insist upon two hundred thousand pounds Sterling, which I had done very effectually, and must have succeeded in, considering the reasonableness of the demand, except the generosity of the King our master's nature, who values money so little, has already condescended to the lesser sum of two millions of Livres, &c.

Extract of a Letter from the Lord-Treasurer Danby to Mr. Montague, Ambassador in France, the 17th of January 1677-8.

"Afterday young Ruvigny came to me with Mr. Barrillon (having given me his Father's letters the day before) and discoursed much upon the confidence the French King hath of the firmness of ours to him: of the good opinion his master hath of me; of his King's resolution to condescend to any thing, that is not infamous to him, for the satisfaction of our King; how certainly our King may depend upon all assistances and supplies from his master, in case the friendship be preserved. — The main of their drift was to engage me to prevail with the Prince of Orange as to the town of Tournay. — The King must come to some declaration of his mind to the Parliament when it meets. That which makes the hopes of peace less probable, is, that the Duke grows every day less inclined to it, and has created a greater indifferency in the King than I could have imagined; which being added to the French King's resolutions, not to part with Tournay, does, I confess, make me despair of any accommodation. Nevertheless, I am assured that one principal cause of this adjournment for thirteen days, has been to find an expedient for the peace; and the effect hath hitherto been, that no body will now believe other than that the peace is already concluded between us and France.

Extract of another letter from the same hand to the same person, dated the 25th of March 1678.

"In case the conditions of peace shall be accepted, the King expects to have six millions of Livres a year for three years, from the time that this agreement shall be signed

(1) The French Ambassador, and Lord Arlington, appeared the only two persons unsatisfied upon it at Court; the first, not knowing how he should answer to his master, that an affair of that importance should pass without his communication, much less advice, in a court where nothing had been done but by his means; and the Lord Arlington that it should pass without his knowledge, who still endeavoured to keep up the Court-opinion of his conduct.

(2) Barne, in his account of the matter, says, that the Lord-Treasurer Danby seeing his ruin was inevitable, if he could not bring the King off from a French interest, gave the Prince of Orange, by Sir William Temple, great hopes of a marriage with the Duke's Daughter, and put the Prince to ask two King's leave to go over to England. When the Prince, after a fruitless stay for some weeks, was going away, the Lord Danby pressed his staying a few days longer, and that the King should make a voyage between the Prince of Orange and the Duke's Daughter. If not, the Parliament would certainly address itself, and so the King would lose the thanks of it. Wherefore if the King did not of his own motion, he would have the honour of it. Having enforced the thing with all the arguments he could, the King was convinced, and sent for the Duke, who obeyed the King's pleasure. Danby ordered the matter, that the Dukes of

(3) The Prince and Princess were hurried out of town so fast, (there being a secret design to invite them to an entertainment in the City by the Country-party, which the Court did not like,) that they had scarce time to make provision for their journey. Being come to Canterbury, they repaired to an Inn, where, through haste they carelessly merely provided. Upon application to borrow money of the Corporation, the Mayor and his Brethren, upon grave declaration, were really afraid to lend them any. Dr. Tillage, then Dean of Canterbury, hearing of this, immediately got together what Plate and Money he could, and went to the Inn to Mr. Beaulieu, with the offer of what he had. This was highly acceptable to the Prince and Princess, and the Dean was afterwards to wait upon them. By the lucky accident, he began that acquaintance and correspondence with the Prince and Mr. Beaulieu, as advanced him

1677. betwixt his Majesty and the King of France; because it will probably be two or three years before the Parliament will be in humour to give him any supplies after the making of any peace with France; and the Ambassador here has always agreed to that sum, but not for so long a time. If you find the peace will not be accepted, you are not to mention the money at all; and all possible care must be taken to have this whole negotiation as private as is possible, for fear of giving offence at home, where for the most part we hear in ten days after of any thing that is communicated to the French Ministers. ---- At the bottom of the letter were these words under the King's own hand ----

I shall make no remarks upon these letters, which plainly shew, with what sincerity the King discharged the office of Mediator, and how much he favoured France. The best excuse for him is, that these secret proceedings and negotiations were only to get money. But when it is considered, that he would have received much more from his Parliament, if he had pursued the paths of uprightness, and might have had more left of what the Parliament would have granted him in one single year, than he hoped to draw from France in three, a man can hardly forbear thinking, that his blind attachment to the interest of France was for hidden designs which it was not yet time to discover. And if it is said, he took money from France, only to be freed from the trouble of applying to his Parliament, this does but confirm that he intended to render himself absolute (1).

The King had not prolonged the adjournment of the Parliament to the 28th of January, in order to find expedients for a general peace, as the Treasurer told Montague in his letter of the 26th of January, but to have time to receive the news of a league with Holland, which was indeed signed the 16th of January. This league was very far from answering the desires of the Parliament. It was properly but defensive, to prevent the King of France from pursuing his conquests in the Netherlands. Nay, it may be easily judged, considering the King's strict union with France, and the secret correspondences between the two Courts, whether he had any great desire to go to war with the King of France, in order to oblige him to restore what he had taken. He believed nevertheless, that this league would be capable to impose upon the Parliament, and therefore had deferred their meeting to receive the news of its conclusion. Supported by this league, which, according to him, was to produce wonderful effects, he made the following Speech to both Houses, the 28th of January.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

WHEN we parted last, I told you, That before we met again I would do that which should be to your satisfaction. I have accordingly made such alliances with Holland, as are for the preservation of Flanders, and which cannot fail of that end, unless prevented either by the want of due assistance to support those alliances, or by the final regard the Spaniards themselves must have to their own preservation. The first of these I cannot suspect, by reason of your repeated engagements to maintain them; and I know you are so wise as to consider, that a war which must be the necessary consequence of them, ought neither to be prosecuted by halves, nor to want such assurances of perseverance as may give me encouragement to pursue it: besides, it will not be less necessary to let our enemies have such a prospect of our resolutions, as may let them see certainly that we shall not be weary of our arms, till Christendom be restored to such a peace, as shall not be in the power of any Prince alone to disturb.

I do acknowledge to you, that I have used all the means possible by a mediation, to have procured an honorable and safe peace for Christendom; knowing how preferable such a peace would have been to any war, and especially to this Kingdom, which must necessarily own the vast benefits it has received by peace, while its neighbours only have yet smarted by the war; but finding it no longer to be hoped for by fair means, it shall not be my fault if that be not obtained by force which cannot be had any other ways. For this reason, I have recalled my troops from France, and have considered, that although the Dutch shall do their parts, we cannot have less on ours than ninety sail of capital ships constantly maintained, nor less than thirty or forty thousand landmen (with their dependencies) to be employed upon our fleets and elsewhere. And because there shall be no fear of mis-employing what you shall give to these uses, I am contented that such money be appropriated to those ends as strictly as you can desire. I have given testimony enough of my care in that kind, by the progress I have made in building the new ships; wherein, for the making them more useful, I have directed such larger dimensions as will cost me above one hundred thousand pounds more than the act allows. I have gone as far as I could in repairing the old fleet, and in buying necessary stores for the navy and ordnance: And in this and other provisions for better securing both my foreign Plantations and the Islands nearer home, I have expended a great deal more than the two hundred thousand pounds you enabled me to borrow upon the excise, although I have not found such credit as I expected upon that security. I have born the charge both of a rebellion in Virginia, and a new war with Algiers: I stand engaged to the Prince of Orange for my Niece's portion, and I shall not be able to maintain my constant necessary establishments, unless the new imposts upon wine, &c. be continued to me, which would otherways turn only to their profit to whom we least intend it.

I hope these things will need little recommendation to you, when you consider your promises in some, and the necessity of the rest; and to let you see, that I have not only employed my time and treasure for your safety, but done all I could to remove all sorts of jealousies, I have married my niece to the Prince of Orange, by which I hope I have given full assurances, that I shall never suffer his interests to be ruined, if I can be assisted, as I ought to be, to preserve them. Having done all this, I expect from you a plentiful supply, suitable to such great occasions, whereon depends not only the honour, but, for ought I know, the being of the English nation, which will not be saved by finding fault afterwards, but may be prevented by avoiding the chief fault of doing weakly and by halves, what can only be hoped from a vigorous and thorough prosecution of what we undertake. These considerations are of the greatest importance that ever concerned this Kingdom, and therefore I would have you enter immediately upon them, without suffering any other business whatsoever to divert you from bringing them to good resolutions."

It is very strange, that Charles II. with more extraordinary supplies than were ever granted to any King of England, with a revenue much larger than that of any of his predecessors, (which, by the calculation of the Commons, amounted to sixteen hundred thousand pounds,) was nevertheless always in want, and oppressed with debts, and in every Speech told his Parliament, that he had expended for the publick, more than was granted him. He had however been engaged but in two wars, which he might have avoided if he had pleased, and saved his Subjects several millions, fruitlessly consumed in these wars. But this is not the only reflection which may be made upon this Speech; there is another of much greater importance.

The whole Speech was founded upon a supposition which naturally ought to have been true, but was not, namely, that his alliance with Holland could not fail to engage him in a war with France, though nothing was farther from his intention. His aim therefore was to represent his alliance with Holland, and the war against France, as one and the same thing, or at least the war as the necessary consequence of this alliance, though he gave no positive hopes of the war. There was indeed a wide distance between the one and the other. For, if the Parliament had granted the immense sums he demanded, it is certain, he might have made peace when he pleased, without expending any of the money in preparations. He would only have had to declare against France, and peace would instantly have followed. For France was not in condition to resist, if England had been sincerely united with the rest of her enemies. Herein the King threw the Parliament into a great dilemma. For, either they were to grant him the large sums he demanded, without having other hope of a future war, than a consequence not absolutely necessary, or in refusing the supply, they gave the King a plausible pretence to say, it was not his fault, that England did not join with the enemies of France. But in the House of Commons were men of sufficient abilities to discover the King's artifices, and instruct their fellow members, wherein they succeeded the more easily, as above two thirds of the House were little inclined to trust to the King's word.

It was therefore resolved, after great debates, to present an address to the King, the substance of which was, ---- That they besought him not to admit of any treaty of peace, whereby the French King should be left in possession of any greater dominion or power, than was left him by the Pyrenean treaty: That no trade be admitted with France, or any goods suffered to be imported from thence, on pain of forfeiture. And when he should be

This address threw the King, in his turn, into a great perplexity. He would have it believed, that he intended to make war upon France, though he had already resolved against it. He could not therefore answer this address without a direct assent or dissent, and this is what he was willing to avoid. To extricate himself, he had recourse to the same expedient he had formerly used. This was, to complain of the great invasion of his prerogative, in thus prescribing the methods he was to use, which at the same time he showed to be ridiculous and impracticable. He said, his speech was to both Houses, and the return ought to be from both. That however, if, by their assistance, he was put into arms sufficient for such a work, he would never be weary, till Christendom was restored to such a peace, that it should not be in the power of one Prince to disturb it: That the rights of making and managing war and peace, belonged solely to him, and they were mistaken, if they thought he would ever depart from that right. That if the Commons would encourage him to go further in alliances, they must consider of raising speedy Supplies; for from the consideration of those he must take his measures.

The meaning of this answer was easily understood, namely, that the King studiously avoided to say positively, he intended to declare war against France, though he wished that consequence to be drawn from his alliance with Holland: Alliance, of which the contents were not known, and which was not yet imparted to the Parliament. He pretended, however, that on his bare declaration or information of an alliance with Holland, the Parliament should enable him to maintain ninety large ships, besides thirty others, and forty thousand land-forces (1). And yet, when the articles of this treaty, shortly after, came to be known, the Commons voted, that it was not pursuant to their desires. It is easy to see, wherein the difference between the King and the Commons consisted. The King feared, or feigned to fear, that the Parliament, after engaging him in a war with France, would leave him destitute of means to support it. The Commons really distrusted his sincerity, and feared, that, after receiving the money, he would think no more of war, but suffer an unsafe peace to be concluded. Let the reader determine for one or other. I shall only say, that, if the reigns of Henry III, and Richard II, are excepted, England had never seen, till within the last sixty years, such mutual distrust between her Kings and Parliaments. It must be imputed to this, that James I, Charles I, and Charles II, were no slaves to their word, and while they pretended to value their sincerity by generals, restrictions, oblique, or ambiguous expressions, they lost entirely the confidence of their Subjects. Every King of England is in danger of being very unhappy, when, by such artifices, he renders suspected the sincerity of what he says in full Parliament.

However this be, the Commons resolved to grant the King a supply, but with strict limitations. At the beginning of this session, they had granted him seventy thousand pounds, for a solemn funeral of his father, whose body could not be found, though it was certainly known to be interred in Windsor chapel. I don't know whether it was ever discovered, or the intended obsequies performed (2).

The Earl of Shaftsbury, after thirteen months confinement in the Tower, was at last discharged. But not till he had begged pardon on his knees at the Bar of the Lords House, as well for his fault as his obstinacy in not acknowledging it (3).

While so much time was spent in England in deliberations about war, the King of France taking the field in February, made himself master of Ghent and Ipses in March, and then put his forces into quarters of refreshment. These conquests so alarmed the Dutch, that from this time they resolved upon a separate peace, though they did not publicly own it. Lewis XIV, who knew their intentions, and had nothing to fear from England, began to talk like a conqueror, and to form himself the plan of the peace he was willing to grant the States, and which it was different from that agreed on between Charles and the Prince of Orange.

On the other hand, the Commons of England alarmed at the progress of the French arms, made haste to finish a bill for raising money by a Poll tax. The 14th of March they resolved upon an address to the King, to pray him to declare war against France, to dismiss the Ambassador of that Crown, and recall his own from Paris, with a promise of the necessary and plentiful supplies. This address was sent the next day to the Lords for their concurrence. But, before an answer was given, the King came to the House of Lords the 20th of March, and after passing the Poll-bill (4), and some others, adjourned the Parliament to the 11th of April.

It is remarkable that five days after, the Lord-Treasurer writ the second of the forementioned Letters to Ambassador Montague, concerning the secret negotiation of which I have spoken.

The Parliament meeting the 11th of April was farther adjourned to the 19th, when the Chancellor acquainted the two Houses, that the King had discovered that the Dutch were thinking of a separate peace without his consent or the privacy, and desired their advice how to proceed. The Commons gave their advice for an actual war with France, and at the same time voted, "That the late leagues made with the States-General of the United-Provinces, were not pursuant to the addresses of the House, nor consistent with the good and safety of the Kingdom." The King returned an answer, which testified his resentment of this vote. But the Commons, not at all discouraged, presented a second address, in which—"They besought him to communicate to them his resolutions upon their advice."—They added, "That the inconveniences and dangers which the Kingdom lay under, might have been totally, or in a great measure prevented, in case his Majesty had accepted of the advice by them given in their address of the 26th of May last, and the 31st of January: They besought him therefore, that he would be pleased to remove those counsellors that advised him to give those answers which he did to the said addresses.—In fine, that he would be pleased to remove the Duke of Lauderdale from his presence and council."—The King immediately answered, That he was much surprised at the extravagancy of their address, and very unwilling at present to give it such a due answer as it deserved. Two days after, namely, the 13th of May, he prorogued the Parliament to the 23d of the same month.

Thus the proposal for a war with France never failed to produce either an adjournment or a prorogation. It must be remarked, that this was at the very time, the separate peace between France and Holland was negotiating, which the Dutch would never have resolved, could they have believed that England would declare for a war. Nevertheless, the King would still have it believed, he was disposed to war, though hitherto he had not positively said it. To this end, immediately after the Poll-bill had passed, he raised thirty thousand men, who were completed in six weeks.

While these forces were raising, and before the prorogation of the Parliament, the States-General sent Van Leuven to the King, to acquaint him, that they were disposed to acquiesce in a peace, because they saw, there was no reliance on the uncertain measures of England. That however, if the King would immediately declare war against France, they would break off all negotiations, and vigorously prosecute the war pursuant to their alliances, and that his declaration was the only thing that could prevent a peace. This was declared to the King by Sir William Temple, from the States Ambassador. The King now finding that a positive answer was to be returned, which he had hitherto avoided, told Sir William Temple, That since the Dutch would have a peace upon the French terms, and France offered money for his consent to what he could not help, he did not know why he should not get the money.

The weakness of this evasion is manifest: for though the Ambassador of the States had declared, there should be

(1) In the debates about raising the Land-forces, Sir William Coventry was for hiring bodies of Troops from the German Princes, and for supplying the Dutch with money. He thought, that which a more properly belong to England, was to let out a great Fleet, and to cut off the French Trade every where; for they were then very high in their Manufactures and Trade. Burnet, p. 431.

(2) The truth of the matter seems to be this: That the King, either had great occasion for that sum of money, or thought he could put it to a better use, than by giving it to a foreigner. Funeral for his father; and so never sent to enquire for the body. For, that King Charles I. was actually buried at Windsor, the following Centenary, given by Mr. John Seauille, Regent at Windsor Castle. — Ann. 1695, Septemb. 21, the same Vault in which King Charles I. was buried, was opened, to lay in a 18 lb. child of the then Princess of Denmark, the late Queen Anne. On the King's Coffin the velvet Pall was being and found, and there was about the Coffin a leaden Band, with this Inscription cut through it, KING CHARLES, 1648. — When the body of King Charles I. lay in State in the Dean's Hall, the Duke of Richmond had the Coffin opened, and was satisfied that it was the King's body. — When the several people have desired to know to be true, who were alive, and then present, Mr. Randolph of New-Windsor, and others. — Ebersd. Tom. 2. p. 440.

(3) The last of the Commons, had recourse to the King's Bench, whether he was brought by a Writ of Habeas Corpus; but the Judges denied his petition. This sentence was given, in an order, which was taken notice of by the Lords, who voted it a breach of Privilege, for which the Earl was transferred his contempt at the bar of the House. He was accordingly brought to the Bar, where he desired to acknowledge his asserting the dissolution of the Parliament to be an undivided action, and to beg their Lordships pardon for his offence, in bringing his Habeas Corpus. Which being done in a Form prescribed by the House, he was released. — Thom. p. 443.

(4) In the Poll-bill there was one Article for raising the money, to be applied to no use but the intended French war; and also another Clause, for giving the Impression of any French Coinage upon the same. — Thom. p. 444.

The King's

no peace, if the King would really engage in a war, the King, supposing this positive declaration, supposed that the States were for a peace upon any terms. Upon this false supposition, he ordered Sir William Temple to treat with Barillon the French Ambassador; but Sir William wisely declined such a negotiation. What Temple refused was undertaken by others, and the same author says, that amongst the articles proposed by the Ambassador of France, for concluding a private treaty with the King, there was one article which was offensive, that the King assured him he would never forget it while he lived. He says no more, whether because he was not informed of it, or did not think proper to divulge what he knew. But Dr. Swift, who published Sir William Temple's letters, acquaints us with that remarkable passage, namely, "That France, in order to break the force of the confederacy, and to evade all just conditions of a general Peace, resolved by any means to enter into separate measures with Holland, to which end it was absolutely necessary to gain the good offices of the King of England, who was looked upon as the master of the Peace when ever he pleased. The bargain was struck for either three or four hundred thousand pounds: But when all was agreed, Mr. Barillon, the French Ambassador, told the King, that he had orders from his master before payment to add a private article, by which his Majesty should be engaged, Never to keep above eight thousand men of standing troops in his three Kingdoms. This unexpected proposal put the King in a rage, and made him say, God's fish! Does my brother of France think to serve me thus? Are all his promises to make me absolute Master of my Realms come to this? Or does he think that a thing to be done with eight thousand men?"

Hence it evidently appears, for what the thirty thousand men the King was raising were intended. They could not be levied for a war against France, though the King used that pretence, since he had already made his bargain with that Crown for four millions of Livres. Nothing else therefore can be thought, but that the King seeing the peace upon the point of conclusion, which he only could, but would not prevent, imagined, that after the peace, the King of France would assist him to become absolute master in his Kingdoms, and furnish him with money to maintain the thirty thousand men without his applying to the Parliament. If this be not so, what account can be given of his conduct in raising an army, at a time when all his proceedings showed, he had not the least desire to make war upon France?

The King was deceived by the promises of Lewis XIV, who artfully took advantage of the eager desire of Charles and the Duke his brother to establish an absolute Government in England, to engage them in all the measures they had taken during the whole war, and which were so directly contrary to the interests of the Kingdom. But when he saw himself secure of a peace with the Dutch, and, by a necessary consequence, of a general peace with all Europe, he made a jest of his promise to his friend. He thought, doubtless, it was not for the interest of France, that the King of England should be absolute, or rather, he feared to engage, for the sole interests of the King of England, in an undertaking capable of kindling a new war, in which all Europe might be concerned.

I know not whether the King consented to Lewis's demands, and am only sure, that he continued his levies, whether with intention to execute his designs without the assistance of France, or in the hope of obtaining better conditions from Lewis, by terrifying him with the apprehension of his joining with the allies, which might still be practicable. By degrees, he spoke more gently of war, and sufficiently declared his inclination for peace. In all appearance, he had adjusted matters with France.

Affairs were in this situation when the Parliament met the 23d of May, after a prorogation of ten days. The King opened the seventeenth session of this long Parliament with a Speech, [the substance of which was as follows,]

"I am resolved, as far as I am able, to save Flanders, either by a war or a peace, which way soever I shall find most conducing towards it. — If I were able I would keep up my army and my navy at sea for some time; but I leave it to you to consider of supplies for their continuance or disbanding; and in either case not to discourage so many worthy and brave Gentlemen, who have offered their lives and service to their Country, and in pursuit of your own advices and resolutions. I must tell you, that a branch of my revenue is now expiring, and another part of it is cut off by a clause in the Poll-bill; that I have borrowed two hundred thousand pounds upon the Excise at your request, of all which you are to consider. I never had any intentions but of good to you and my People, nor ever shall; therefore I desire you will not drive me into extremities, which must end ill both for you and me, and (which is worst) for the nation. I desire to prevent all disorders or mischief that may befall by our disagreement; but in case there do, I leave it to God Almighty to judge who is the occasion of it. One thing more I have to add, and that is, that I will never more suffer the course and method of passing laws to be changed, by tacking together several matters in one Bill. The rest I leave to the Lord-Chancellor."

The Chancellor's Speech, according to custom, tended to excuse the King's measures. As he only enlarged upon what the King had said more succinctly, I think it needless to insert the Speech, which offered nothing new or material.

The House of Commons having adjourned themselves for three days, met again the 27th of May, and came to the following resolution; "That the House taking into consideration the state of the nation, and the expense occasioned by the army, were humbly of opinion, that if his Majesty pleased to think fit to enter into the war against the French King, the House was, and would be always ready to assist him in that war; but if otherwise, they would proceed to the consideration of providing for the speedy disbanding of the army."

The House further ordered, That the members of his Majesty's Privy-Council should acquaint the King with this vote, and pray his speedy answer. The King replied, "That the French King had made such offers of a cessation till the 27th of July, that he believed they would not only be accepted, but end in a general peace; yet, as that was uncertain, it would not be prudent to dismiss either fleet or army before that time." Upon this answer the House voted, "That all forces raised since the 29th of September last (except those transported to foreign plantations) be forthwith paid off and disbanded; and that they would consider of a supply for that purpose." Accordingly the 4th of June the House voted two hundred thousand pounds for the disbanding of the army by the end of the month, and the next day they voted the same sum towards defraying the expenses of the fleet.

Upon these votes the King, by a message, told the House, that his mind was still the same, that the army and fleet ought to be kept up till the expected peace should be concluded; and he further recommended to their consideration, "Whether it were not dishonourable for him to recall his forces in Flanders from those towns which he had taken into his protection, before they could provide themselves of other succours." Upon this consideration the Commons extended the time, as to the forces in Flanders, to the 27th day of July.

The 15th of June, the House resolved, that, "after the Tuesday following, no motions should be made for any new supplies of money, till after the next recess." As hitherto the House had experienced, that the King only amused them, and intended to have the money before he positively declared himself, they resolved to put him under a necessity of declaring, within three days, for fear he should still continue to amuse them, till it was too late. Accordingly, on that very Tuesday the King came to the House of Peers, and, sending for the Commons, told both Houses, "That the peace between France, Spain, and Holland, was almost concluded, in which his part would be not only that of Mediator, but also to give his warrants in it. That Spain writes word, That unless England bears the charge of maintaining Flanders, even after the peace, they will not be in a condition to support it long. Therefore to that end it was necessary to keep up the Navy at sea; and not only so, but to give the world some assurance of being well united at home: That though the House of Commons might think such a peace as ill a bargain as a war, because it would cost them money, yet if they seriously consider, that Flanders had been lost, and perhaps by this time, he believed they would give much greater sums than that would cost, rather than the single town of Ostend should be in French hands, and forty of their men of war in so good a haven, over-against the river's mouth." Then he insinuated to them, "That they could not but be pleased to understand the reputation England had gained abroad, by having in forty days, raised an army of thirty thousand men, and prepared a Navy of ninety men of war; therefore, if they desired to keep up the honour of the Crown at home, and look to the safety of the balance of affairs abroad; if they desired he should pass any part of his life in quiet, and all the rest in confidence and kindness with them, and other future Parliaments, they must find a way not only to settle for his life his revenue as at Christmas last, but also to add a new fund of three hundred thousand pounds per Annum, upon which he would pass an Act to settle fifty thousand pounds upon the Navy and Ordnance; and should be likewise ready to consent to all such laws as they should propose for the good of the nation." He lastly reminded them, "to

Would not one think at reading this Speech, that the King had hitherto kept the balance of Europe perfectly even, and was thereby intitled to demand, that he should be enabled to preserve it? Would not one think, that he had done the nation some important service, which deserved an augmentation to his revenue of three hundred thousand pounds a year? But the Commons were so used to such Speeches, that they made no impression upon them. If their distrust of the King had been hitherto great, it may be affirmed, it considerably increased, when they saw a peace concluded, which diminished not the great power of France, but left Europe exposed to her mercy. It was evident, the King might, if he had pleased, have procured a more advantageous peace. After this, it is not strange, that his strict union with France, was suspected to conceal designs which were not for the good of the nation. Accordingly, when the Commons came to debate on the additional revenue demanded by the King, it was unanimously rejected (1). Moreover, the House refused to give a compensation for the loss sustained by the King in the prohibition of French commodities. In short, the Lords having passed the Bill for disbanding the army, with an enlargement of the time prefixed for one month longer, the Commons absolutely refused their consent to the amendment.

The King perceiving by this, what he was to expect from the Commons, came to the Parliament the 15th of July, and passed several Bills, of which these were the principal.

1. An Act for granting a supply of six hundred and nineteen thousand, three hundred and eighty pounds, for disbanding the army, and other uses therein mentioned.
2. An Act for granting an additional duty to his Majesty upon Wines for three years.
3. An Act for burying in Woolen. This Act, which is still in force, is very serviceable to the flannel manufacture, and consequently makes a great consumption of wool.

These Acts being passed, the Chancellor acquainted both Houses, that the King thought proper to prorogue them to the first of August, and so to keep them in call, by short prorogations, and that his intention was, they should not meet till winter, unless there was occasion for their assembling sooner. Thus ended the seventeenth session of this Parliament. And thus England saw herself engaged in an expence of six hundred thousand pounds, to pay an army and fleet, which certainly had not been prepared to make war with France, or for the security of England.

While the Parliament was sitting, the States-General feared that nothing was to be hoped for from England, treating with France, both for themselves and Spain, with regard to the Netherlands. At last, every thing being settled, and the King of France promising to restore to the Spaniards, Ghent, Aeth, Charleroy, Oudenard, Courtray, and Limburg, the States ordered their Plenipotentiaries at Nimeguen to sign the peace the last of June. It was universally expected, that the peace would be signed that day. But as the time for this restitution had been neglected but it was to be immediately after the exchange of the ratifications, the Spanish Ambassador happened the day before, to ask the French Plenipotentiaries, when they would restore the towns? To this they positively answered, that it would not be till after the restitution of the towns taken from the King of Sweden, by the allies in the north (2). This unexpected pretension put a stop to the signing of the peace, and the Dutch Plenipotentiaries received express orders from their masters not to sign, unless France would engage to restore the six places, upon the ratification of the treaty. But the French were immovable, and appeared resolute to continue the war, unless Sweden was satisfied.

Charles being informed of this new difficulty, and told moreover by the French Ambassador, that it was his master's intention, immediately sent Sir William Temple to Holland, with full power to sign a league with the States, by which they should be mutually bound to continue the war, in case France should not agree to evacuate the six towns within such a time. This league was really concluded and signed the 26th of July, to the great satisfaction of the Prince of Orange, and those who thought the peace very disadvantageous.

The readiness with which this resolution was taken by the King, much surprized those who from his former proceedings had no great opinion of his sincerity. But when it was seen that the league was concluded, and France continued obstinate, it was hoped, the war would be renewed with more vigour than ever, and that England would incline the balance to the side of the allies. It is difficult to discover the motive of the King's vigorous resolution. Some have believed, he was really offended at the contempt France seemed to show, of his mediation, in starting such an incident. Others have thought, that foreseeing France would at last comply, notwithstanding her seeming resolution, he had a mind to redeem his credit by his vigour with the English, who till then strongly suspected him of too close a correspondence with that Crown. Others have judged, that he took this resolution, in order to obtain a large supply from the Parliament, not doubting but he should be afterwards able to procure a peace.

However this be, it appeared shortly after, that the King repented of what he had done, and feared that his league would rekindle the war. At the time that the Dutch were preparing to improve this happy juncture, to break off the negotiation with France, and to rise in their demands, one Du Croi, an Agent of Sweden at London brought an express order from the King for Sir William Temple to repair immediately to Nimeguen, and use his utmost endeavours to persuade the Plenipotentiaries of Sweden to consent to the evacuation of the six towns within a limited time. The King ordered him likewise to assure them, that after the peace he would use the most effectual endeavours he could, for the restitution of all the Territories the Swedes had lost in the war. It was not difficult for Sir William Temple to infer from hence, that the King had no inclination to quarrel with France. But he was still more fully convinced, when he was informed from Pensionary Fagel, that Du Croi had been with the States Deputies, and acquainted them with the order he had brought; that he had also said, the terms of the peace were absolutely agreed between the Kings of France and England, and from some expressions he had heard the King use, intimated, it would be in vain to pretend to prevent it. As Sir William and the Pensionary could not doubt that Du Croi was sent by the King, they concluded, either the King had changed his mind, or had never designed to enter into a war with France. Wherefore the States, instead of forming new schemes, were contented with the plan already agreed on, with a resolution however not to sign the treaty till the restitution of the six towns was assured within such a time (3).

Since the league had been concluded at the Hague, the Temple, King of France, to whom it was communicated, had used all possible artifices to elude, and bring it to a negotiation, with an offer to treat upon it, either at St. Quintin or Ghent. But the States, on the contrary, had expressly ordered their Ambassadors to break off the negotiation, if the peace was not signed by such a day, with the article of the evacuation of the towns in a limited time. Sir William Temple came to Nimeguen but three days before the expiration of the time fixed by the States. On his arrival he found very little disposition on either side towards signing the peace; the French and Dutch appeared equally inflexible, and the latter would not hear either of any negotiation or delay. At last came the critical day, the 11th of August, fixed by the treaty at the Hague, in the morning of which the French Ambassadors desisted from their pretensions, and the peace was signed before twelve that night. This gave France the desired satisfaction of making a separate peace with Holland, which was immediately followed by a peace between France and Spain, and some months after with all the confederate powers, except the Duke of Lorraine, who could never obtain his re-establishment. It may be affirmed with great truth, that the King of England might have procured Europe a more advantageous peace, since the Parliament would have granted him the necessary supplies, if he had pleased to act agreeably to the interest of Europe in general, and of England in particular. His conduct can only be ascribed to his desire of executing the project of rendering himself absolute, and introducing the Popish Religion in England, which he thought could not be accomplished without the assistance of France.

The league concluded between England and Holland, the 26th of July, had, as I said, fixed the 11th of August for signing the peace. In this interval the King of France had by his General the Duke of Luxemburg blockaded up Mons. All his artifices to draw the affair of the evacuation into a negotiation, were only to gain time for Luxemburg to become master of Mons before the peace was signed. But the Dutch being bent not to enter into treaty upon that affair, the French General had not time to make any great progress before that place. Mean while the 1673. Prince of Orange being informed that peace was upon the point of being signed, and desiring to distinguish himself by some great action, marched directly to the Duke of Luxembourg, surprised him, and gave him a considerable check (1). This battle, called afterwards the battle of St. Denis, being fought the 14th of August, three days after the peace was signed, gave occasion to various opinions concerning this action of the Prince of Orange. Some said he knew not the peace was signed. Others pretended, the news was brought him by an express, but not from the States, and therefore he might improve the present advantages. However, with this action ended a war which had lasted six years, and was at first so fatal to Holland, that the Republick saw it self on the brink of destruction.

On present the upon the Popish Plot.
We are now come to the discovery of the famous conspiracy known in England by the name of the Popish Plot, which makes one of the principal periods of this Reign, and has given occasion to many Politicians to exercise their talents, some in supporting the reality, others in exposing the falsity of it. What I have been saying is sufficient to demonstrate the impossibility for any Historian whatever, to please two sorts of men, whose sentiments are diametrically opposite, and who, through prejudice, religion, passion, and party-interest are previously disposed to believe or disbelieve the Popish Plot. A Historian is in vain impartial if his Readers are not so. The course of this History engages me to speak of this famous conspiracy, on which depend all the events of the rest of this Reign. It may well be judged, that I do not expect to satisfy all the World: this I take to be an impossible thing. What therefore I propose is, to inform the Reader of the conspiracy itself, whether true or false, of the reasons and proofs alledged in maintenance of the reality or falshood, and to have the inward satisfaction of saying nothing but what I believe to be true.

But before I proceed to the particulars, it is absolutely necessary to clear some ambiguities which I have observed in the Writers of both sides, that the Reader may be the better prepared to be upon his guard.

1. The word Plot in English, and Conspiration in French, are always taken in a bad sense. Their general signification is, a Design, but an unlawful Design to attempt something against the person of the King or his ministers, against the constitution of the Government, against the established Religion, in short, a Design bad in itself, wherein the publick is concerned, and for the execution whereof means and instruments are already prepared. But if any one maintains, there is nothing unlawful in a design to change a bad Religion established, in order to introduce a better; or if on supposition that a Government was established by force and violence, it is affirmed, there is nothing ill or unlawful in a design to restore it to its antient state, it is plain, this will only be a dispute about words. Thus the fact or design in itself may be allowed, which by some will be termed a Plot, whilst others will not give it that name. This has been the case with some Authors who have spoken of the Popish Plot. They own there was a design to alter the form of the Government, and subvert the Protestant Religion, and yet deny there was a Plot.

2. This Plot, true or false, contained three particular designs. 1. To kill the King. 2. To subvert the Government. 3. To extirpate the Protestant Religion, and establish Popery (2). Most of the writers instead of considering these three articles, as branches of one and the same Plot, have affected to separate them. Some have chiefly insisted upon the design of killing the King, and slightly touched upon the other two. They believed themselves able to prove the falshood of this design, and therefore concluded that there was no real Plot. Others meeting with some improbabilities in the depositions of the witnesses concerning the design of killing the King, have chiefly endeavoured to prove the two last articles, from whence they have inferred, there was a true and real Plot. The Reader must be upon his guard against these artifices which entirely alter the State of the question, and always remember, that the Plot did not consist in the single design to kill the King, or in the single design to subvert the Government, or in that to change Religion, but in all these three designs united together, and making but one and the same conspiracy.

3. Those who assert the reality of the Plot, pretend, that the King, the Duke of York, and some of the ministers were the heads and contrivers, and give many proofs, some of which have already appeared in the transactions of this reign. The opposite party object, that it is a manifest contradiction to make the King author of a plot to take away his own life: That, besides, conspiracies of Subjects against their sovereigns have been common, but to accuse a Prince of a Plot against his Subjects is a thing never heard of. To these objections it is answered, that though the Plot contained three articles, the two last only were essential, and of these the King was the head and contriver: That the article of killing the King, though placed first, was only consequent to, and depending upon, the two others. That this was only the attempt of some of the conspirators, who believed, there was no readier way to execute the Plot, than by setting the Duke of York upon the throne, who was less timorous and more active and daring than his brother. That therefore there is no contradiction in the supposition, that the King was the head and author of the two designs, of subverting the Government, and changing Religion; and that the other was carried on by some persons without his privity, in order to advance the progress of the Plot. That therefore the difficulty of this objection proceeds from the preposterous joining the three articles when they ought to be separated, as on other occasions they are separated where they ought to be joined. As to the second objection, that it is impossible a King should plot against his Subjects, it is drawn from the word Plot, which is very rarely applicable to a Sovereign. But it is by no means impossible for a King of England, whose power is limited by law, to form a design of establishing an arbitrary and despotic Government, as appears in the examples of Edward II, Richard II, James I, and Charles I. Now a man may refuse, if he pleases, to give to such a design the name of a Plot, provided he does but own the reality of the thing.

4. Lastly, it will be proper to premise, that there are three opinions concerning the reality or falshood of this Plot. The first is of those who believe it true in all its branches and circumstances. The second, of those who believe it absolutely false, and invented on purpose to exasperate the People against the King and the Duke of York. The third, of those who believe it true with regard to the design of rendering the King absolute, and altering Religion, but doubtful with respect to the design of killing the King, and who after duly weighing the Pro and Con, think they ought to suspend their judgment on this article. I thought it necessary to arm my Readers with these few observations against the prejudices, they may have received in reading other Historians, who scruple not, to disguise and curtail the facts, to pass over in silence such as are disadvantageous to them, to insist and lay great stress upon others; to insert in their relations many stories admitted by their party, but supported with no authority; to add numberless insinuations founded only on their prejudices; in a word, to suppose continually what they have undertaken to prove. This would evidently appear in a disputation in form, but is very easy to be done in a continued narrative, where the writer inserts whatever he thinks proper.

The 12th of August, (the day after the signing of the Treaty of Nimeguen) Dr. Ezrael Tonge, a London Divine, ^{covers the Plot in this King's Narrative, by Mr. Echard.} applied himself to one Christopher Kirkby (3), who had some interest at Court, to tell the King, there was a Plot against his person. Kirkby discharging his commission the next day, whilst the King was walking in St. James's Park, the King ordered him to bring Tonge to him at eight that evening. Tonge came to Whitehall at the appointed hour, and delivered to the King a writing or narrative, which in forty-three articles, contained the particulars of a plot. The King, after looking over it superficially, told Tonge, he was going to Windsor the next day, but would put the paper into the hands of the Lord-Treasurer Danby, on whom he ordered him to wait the next morning.

Accordingly on the 14th of August, Tonge waited on the Treasurer, who asked him if the paper left with the King, was an original or copy. Tonge answered, it was a copy of a writing which had been thrown into his house without his knowledge: but fancied it was by a certain person who had often entertained him upon subjects of the like nature. Some days after Tonge returned to the Treasurer, and told him, he knew the man, who had even put into his hands another narrative larger than the former, which he delivered to the Treasurer. After the Earl had looked over the paper, he asked Tonge, whether he knew

Upon news of the next day, the Duke of Luxembourg, with a great complement, desired an interview with the Prince, and they met in the field. Baynne, T. II. c. 2.

The Treasurer asked, if he knew where they lodged, that they might be secured. Tonge answered he did not, but would endeavour to inform himself.

who forbids the publication of it.

The Treasurer having given the King an account of what he had learned from Tonge, and of the contents of the two narratives, desired him at the same time, that a warrant might be sent for apprehending honest William (1), and Pickering, and some other members of the Council be informed of an affair which concerned his Majesty's life. But the King would neither suffer the two men to be apprehended, nor permit the Earl to speak of it to any person living, and particularly to the Duke of York.

Some days after, Tonge sent word to the Lord Treasurer, that he knew where honest William and Pickering lodged: He said moreover, some of the intended assassins were to go within two days to Windsor; but that he would give notice of the time fixed for their journey, that they might be arrested at their arrival. But some days after, he pretended, the journey had been prevented by an accident to one of their horses. The King from thence concluded the whole to be a fiction, and though the truth might easily have been discovered, by apprehending the two men whose lodgings were known, he would never permit, either that they should be apprehended, or the affair communicated to any member of the Council, saying, He should alarm all England, and put thoughts of killing him into People's heads who had no such thoughts before.

This reason being, as appears, very weak, it can only be inferred from the King's conduct, that he believed not the Plot, or had some interest to shew he did not believe it.

Three days after, Tonge writ to the Earl of Danby, that a packet of letters was to go to the Post-House in Windsor, directed to one Bedingfield a Priest (2). The packet came indeed, and Bedingfield, after reading the letters, carried them to the Duke of York, telling him, He feared some ill was intended him by the said packet, because the letters therein seemed to be of a dangerous nature, and that he was sure they were not the hand-writing of the persons whose names were subscribed to the letters (3). The King being more confirmed in the belief that there was nothing real in the pretended plot, seemed resolved not to permit the papers or informations received from Tonge to be produced. But the Duke of York was so very earnest to have the letters, directed to Bedingfield, examined by the Council, that the King at last consented, and gave the Treasurer leave to declare at the same time the intelligence received from Tonge, and so the affair became publick.

I have not hitherto mentioned the famous Titus Oates, principal actor in this Play, because having resolved to advance nothing but what I believe exactly true, I did not think proper to adopt whatever has been said concerning him and his secret conferences with Dr. Tonge, of which not a single voucher is produced. However, I think myself obliged briefly to relate, what has been advanced by others, though with no other certainty than their own testimony.

"Titus Oates was the son of a Ribbon-weaver, who afterwards turning Anabaptist-Preacher, and being chaplain to a regiment of Cromwell's forces in Scotland, was there clapt up in prison upon Overton's plot against that usurper; but having the fortune to escape upon the King's restoration, he conformed to the Church, and got the living of Hastings in Suffex; where he continued till he thought fit to return again to his former Anabaptist station. This son of his had his first education in Merchant-Taylor's school in London, and next in the University of Cambridge, where he was Student in two Colleges, Caius's and St. John's, and where he left no reputation behind him for his parts or learning; though he seemed distinguished for a tenacious memory, a plodding industry, and an unparalleled assurance, besides a particular canting way that appeared in his Academical Exercises. Removing from thence he slipped into orders,

"and for a while officiated as Curate to his father; after which he enjoyed a small Vicarage in Kent (4), from whence he removed to another in Suffex, and after that for some time got into the Duke of Norfolk's family, when he particularly sided with the Socinians at London; so that he became very uncertain as to his principles and Religion, and infamous as to his morals (5). In the last year, 1677, being abandoned and destitute of common necessaries, he fell into the acquaintance of Dr. Ezrael Tonge, a City Divine, a man of letters, and a prolific head, filled with all the Romish plots and conspiracies since the reformation (6). This man was remarkable for his parts and great reading, but of a restless and humorous temper, full of variety of projects, and scarce ever without a pen in his hand, and a plot in his head. At first he seemed to entertain Oates out of charity, who then went by the name of Ambrose; and complaining that he knew not where to get bread, the Doctor took him to his house, gave him cloaths, lodging and diet, and told him he would put him in a way. After which, finding him a bold undertaker, he persuaded him to insinuate himself among the Papists, and get particular acquaintance with them: Which being effected, he let him understand, that there had been several plots in England to bring in Popery, and if he would go beyond sea among the Jesuits, and strictly observe their ways, it was possible there might be one at present; and if he could make that out, it would be his preferment for ever: But however, if he could get their names, and some informations from the Papists, it would be easy to rouse People with the fears of "Popery."

Pursuant to this advice, Oates reconciled himself to the Church of Rome, and moreover, according to some, entered into the Society of the Jesuits. In April 1677, he was sent to Valadolid in Spain, where he remained six months, and then returned to England. After a month's stay he was sent to St. Omer's, the English seminary, for farther discoveries. In short, the latter end of June the same year, he returned to England, and repaired to his friend Tonge, furnished with materials picked up at St. Omer's. Out of these materials Tonge and Oates, at several conferences together either at London, or in a hired house at Lambeth (7), framed the papers or narratives delivered by Tonge to the King and the Lord-Treasurer Danby, as copies of what Oates had written with his own hand.

I omit many circumstances of what is said to pass between Tonge and Oates, which seem to suppose, either there was some third person who related all these particulars, or else, that one of the two discovered them before his death. The intent of this recital is, as may easily be seen, to shew, that Tonge and Oates were the inventors of this plot, which made so much noise afterwards, and never existed but in their heads. It must be owned, that if this was well proved, it would be a sufficient evidence, that the plot discovered by Oates was a fiction. In the recital appears, Tonge a Divine, who (having a prolific head filled with all the Romish plots and conspiracies since the reformation) fancies it possible there may be one now on foot. He persuades Oates to insinuate himself among the Papists, turn Catholic, and be entered into the Society of the Jesuits, in order to have opportunity to make discoveries. Oates complies, returns from St. Omer, freighted with materials, out of which these two men draw up a narrative of a horrid plot against the person of the King, the Government, and the Protestant Religion, and Tonge undertakes to deliver it to the King. If all this be true, there is need of no other proofs: this alone is sufficient to demonstrate that the plot was a fiction, and a chimera. Wherefore, if ever there is reason to give the readers some assurance of what is advanced, with so many circumstances, it is in such a case as this, which alone decides the question. But I must warn the reader, that those who have advanced these facts, have not vouchsafed to give the least proof. They have not said, that they were received from such or such persons then living. They have cited no authors before them, nor, in short, produced one voucher of what they have advanced concerning facts, which naturally could come to their knowledge, but by some extraordinary means. It is a design managed between Tonge and Oates alone, without the intervention of any third person. It is certain, neither Oates nor Tonge revealed these pretended 16-2. particulars before their death, or ever retracted their informations. It is therefore justly wished, that those who have reported their secret conferences with such particular circumstances, had produced some authority for what they have advanced.

Here follows the substance of the writing delivered by Tonge to the King, in form of a deposition. Titus Oates was the Speaker, though he had not signed it, and though his name did not appear in it.

his name did not appear in it. " That in April 1677, the said Deponent was employed by Strange, the then Provincial, Keins, Fenwick, Harcourt, and other Jesuits in London, to carry their letters to one Father Suiman, an Irish Jesuit, at Madrid in Spain: That in his journey he broke open the said letters, and found therein, an account given of what Jesuits they had sent into Scotland, to encourage the P. E. byterians to rebel; and that they feared not success in their designs, by reason of the King's being so addicted to his pleasures, and their interest in the Duke of York, &c. That he saw several Students sent out of England to Yrsladodid, who were obliged by the Jesuits of the College to renounce their allegiance to his Majesty of Great-Britain; and that one Amstrong, in a Sermon to the Students there, did affirm, that Charles Stuart, the King of England, is no lawful King, but comes of a spurious race, and that his Father was a black Scotchman, and not King Charles the First; with several other traitorous words and correspondencies which he there discovered. Being returned to England, where he made farther discoveries; about the beginning of December, the said Deponent was sent with another reasonable letter, written by Strange, and several other Jesuits, to St. Omers, wherein was expressly mentioned their design to stab or poison the King; and that they had received ten thousand pounds from la Chaise, which was in the hands of one Worsly a Goldsmith in London: That he was likewise involved a letter of thanks to Father la Chaise, which the deponent carried to him from St. Omers to Paris. During this his journey, and being abroad, he saw and read many other letters, all tending to the same end of cutting off the King, subverting the present Government of England, and restoring the Romish Religion; and they were so confident as in some of them to say, That his Majesty of England was brought to that pass, [that is, to possessed of their fidelity.] that if any Male-contents among them should not prove true, but offer to discover, he would never believe them."

But one of the principal things he tells us in this Narrative, was, "That April 1678, he came over from St. Omer's with more Jesuits, to the grand consuit which was held in Moy, by about fifty Jesuits, at the White Horse tavern in the Strand, where they met and plotted their designs for their Society: From whence they dispersed into several clubs, five or six in a company, where they signed a Refolve for the death of the King, with the manner how it was to be done, which the deponent, as a messenger, carried from one company to another to be signed. Very shortly after he returned to St. Omer's, and towards the end of June came back to England; where he soon became pivity to the treaty with Wakenham to poison, and Hon. J. William and Pickering to shoot, the King; and that he heard Keins a Jesuit preach a Sermon to twelve perions of quality in disguise; wherein he asserted, That Protestant and other heretical Princes were ipso facto deposed, because such, and that it was as lawful to destroy them, as an Oliver Cromwell, or any other Usurper, &c."

Well, or after dinner chapter, etc. Besides these new discoveries, he tells us, that he learnt several other remarkable particulars from them, as, "That the late wars, and many other mischiefs were brought about them; but more particularly the dreadful fire in 1666, which was principally managed by Strange the Provincial; in which their Society employed eighty, or eighty six men, he could not tell which, and spent seven hundred fire-balls, and, over and above all their vast expence, they were fourteen thousand pounds gainers by the plunder, amongst which was a box of jewels, consisting of a thousand carats of diamonds. He farther learnt, that the fire in Southwark in the year 1676, was brought about by the like means; and though in that they were at the expence of a thousand pounds, they made a shift to get two thousand clear into their own pockets."

This deposition, as I said, was at last communicated to the Council by the King's permission. Probably, the King managed, that the Council took no great notice of this affair, and looked upon the discovery as a forgery. After that, the Lord-Treasurer seeing he was clear of the business, since it was imparted to the Council, would no longer hearken to Tonge, but when he came, dismissed him, either unheard, or with injurious language. This made Tonge and Oates resolve to bring the affair before the Parliament. But as they had cause to fear, that the Court would find means to suppress this deposition, or represent it as a writing without name and authority, they applied to Sir F. Munday Godfrey, a Justice of Peace in St. Martin's Parish, and Oates requested him to receive his oath, that the paper which he put into his hands, contained matters of treason, and other high crimes. Godfrey was unwilling to grant their request, and the rather, because he was not suffered to read the particulars. But at last, Tonge depending upon oath, that the same had been communicated to the King, Oates was sworn, and a certificate given. This was the 15th of September.

Sometime after the King being returned to London, whether the Council had been informed of the resolution of Tonge and Oates, or feared to be accused of negligence, in an affair which concerned the King and the publick, or from some other motive, they resolved to examine into the bottom of this matter. For this purpose, the 27th of September, six weeks after the King had received the first information, Tonge was sent for by the Council, but not coming till the Council was risen, he was ordered to attend the next day. In this interval, Tonge took another copy of Oates's deposition, and, it is pretended, inserted several articles which were not in the first, but these new informations are not specified. However, this was the copy which was afterwards published under the title of Oates's Deposition. This copy being finished, Tonge and Kirby carried it to Sir Edmundsbury Geoffrey the Justice, and left it in his hands (1).

On the morrow, the Council examined Tonge and Kirkby, and then ordered Oates to be cald in. After their examination, Tonge and Oates had lodgings assigned them in Whitehall, by order of the Council, with a guard for their security, and a weekly salary for their subsistence. And now the Privy-council for above a week, sat twice a day on this affair, and employed Oates, as he was the first discoverer of the plot, three days and nights to search after and seize the persons of the conspirators, and secure their papers. By his means, and upon his depositions, were arrested, Sir George Wakeman, the Queen's Physician, Mr. Edward Coleman, the Duke of York's Secretary, Mr. Richard Langhorne, Thomas Whitebread, John Gwinn, Anthony Turner, William Ireland, William Manshol, William Rumley, James Coker, Thomas Pickering, and many others. The eight last were Romish Priests or Jesuits. In Coleman's house were found letters which greatly confirmed Oates's testimony, and will be hereafter remembered (2).

Though no particulars of the Plot had yet been published, the people were informed in general, that the design of it was to kill the King, subvert the Government, and change the established Religion. The imprisonment of so great a number of Roman Catholics, suggested that they were at least suspected of being concerned. This was sufficient to make them believe the sole authors of the Plot. But an accident, a few days after, so confirmed this belief, that nothing was able to shake it. This was, that Sir Edmundbury Godfrey, who had sworn Oates to his narrative, after having been missing four days, was found dead in a ditch about a mile out of London (3), with his sword thro' his body, his cane and gloves by him, rings upon his fingers, and money in his pocket (4). The Coroners inquest sat upon the body, but meeting with some difficulties adjourned to the day following, when, upon the declaration of the Surgeons, they gave up their Verdict "That he was murdered by certain persons unknown to the Jurors, and that his death proceeded from suffocation and strangling (5); and that his sword had been thrust through his body some time after his death, and when he was quite cold, because not the least sign of blood was seen upon his shirt, or his clothes, or the place where he was found." Though it was possible, this murder might not have been committed by the Papists, they were so readily and publicly accused, that it was not safe to deny it, and that the people drew from it an invincible proof of the plot, and the assurance of the Papists being the authors. It was not conceived, what interest the Protestants could have to murder this Justice, but it was obvious that 1678. the Papists might do it in revenge for his swearing Oates to his Narrative. The Catholics were then in a situation not to dare to vindicate themselves. The people were universally incensed against them, and the Court would not openly protect them. It passed therefore for certain, that the Papists were Godfrey's murderers. Of this will hereafter appear positive evidence. But as, a few years after, the face of affairs was changed, the Papists and friends of the Court found means to give another turn to this murder. First, They raised strong objections to invalidate the depositions of the witnesses. Secondly, They observed, that the death of Sir Edmundbury Godfrey could be of no great advantage to them, since he only swore Oates to his Narrative, and from that time to his death meddled no more. Thirdly, They insinuated, that Godfrey had murdered himself, out of fear of being hanged for not discovering sooner what he knew. Fourthly, and upon this they chiefly insisted, they pretended that Godfrey had been murder'd by the Protestants, in order to throw the odium of his death upon the Papists. Now as the Papists had no interest to publish this murder, it is pretended, that his death was concealed till the body was found, and then published by those who committed the deed, in order to charge the Catholics with it. But tho' it were true, that the whole City was filled with the rumour of Godfrey's murder the day after he disappeared, it seems to me, that the consequence drawn from thence would not be necessary. Thus much is certain, Godfrey was murdered, and the Papists were charged with the deed, as long as the Protestant-party prevailed; but when the face of affairs was altered, the Court-party did, and still do, accuse the Protestants of it (1).

However this be, the King, who was then at Newmarket, returning to London to hold the Parliament, published a Proclamation, with the promise of five hundred pounds reward to the discoverer of the murderers of Sir Edmundbury Godfrey. But as this Proclamation had but little effect, because it was suggested that the discoverers would be in danger of an assassination; the King published a second, with an assurance of his protection to those who should make the discovery (2).

Mean time, the King was extremely perplexed. He had at first endeavoured to stifle the noise of this conspiracy, by concealing it from his very Council; but was forced at last to consent it should be communicated to them: And the precautions taken by Tonge and Oates, in putting the deposition into the hands of a Justice, had obliged the Council to take precautions also for their own sakes, in causing many persons to be arrested. The murder of Sir Edmundbury Godfrey happening upon this, and the whole Kingdom being alarmed at it, there was no possibility of stifling the noise of the Plot, which had now reached the most distant parts. The King therefore resolved to take the only course left, which was to prevent, if possible, this affair from coming before the Parliament. He was not ignorant of the disaffection of the Commons. The transactions of the last summer shewed, that he was suspected of designs prejudicial to Church and State, and all his proceedings had given but too just cause for this suspicion. He therefore feared very justly, that the Parliament would examine into the bottom of this plot; and, under a pretence of taking care of his person, discover many things which were yet to be concealed. For, as I have remarked, this plot contained three articles, namely, the three designs of killing the King; subverting the Government; and changing the established Religion. In all appearance, the King believed not the first, but could not be ignorant of the two last. Nay, his whole conduct had made this too clear, that all the Kingdom was in a manner convinced of it. To avoid therefore so dangerous a discussion; he resolved to take from the Parliament the examination of the plot. For this purpose, he expressly commanded the Earl of Danby, his prime Minister, not to acquaint the two Houses with what had passed through his hands, and resolved so to order it, that every thing concerning the plot should be left to the law, in the belief that it would be much easier for him to manage the Judges than the Parliament.

The 21st of October, the King opened the 18th session of this Parliament with the following Speech:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

I Have thought the time very long since we parted last, and would not have deferred your meeting by so many prorogations, if I could well have met you sooner. The part which I had this summer in the preservation of our Neighbours, and the well securing what was left of Flanders, is sufficiently known, and acknowledged by all that are abroad. And though for this cause I have been obliged to keep up my troops, without which our Neighbours had absolutely despaired; yet both the honour and the interest of the nation have been so far improved by it, that I am confident no man here would repine at it, or think the money raised for their disbanding, to have been ill-employed in their continuance; and I do assure you, I am so much more out of purse for that service, that I expect you should supply it. How far it may be necessary, considering the present state of Christendom, to reduce the land and sea forces, or to what degree, is worthy of all our serious considerations.

I now intend to acquaint you (as I shall always do with any thing that concerns me) that I have been informed of a design against my person by the Jesuits, of which I shall forbear any opinion, least I may seem to say too much or too little: But I will leave the matter to the law, and in the mean time will take as much care as I can, to prevent all manner of practices by that sort of men, and of others too, who have been tampering in a high degree by Foreigners, and contriving how to introduce Popery amongst us. I shall conclude with recommending to you my other concerns. I have been under great disappointments by the defect of the Poll-bill. My revenue is under great anticipations, and at best was never equal to the constant and necessary expence of the Government, whereof I intend to have the whole state laid before you, and require you to look into it, and consider of it, with that duty and affection which I am sure I shall ever find from you. The rest I leave to the Lord Chancellor."

The King had hoped by his precautions to prevent the Parliament from taking cognizance of the Plot. But the Earl of Danby broke all his measures, by communicating the very first day, Oates's Narrative to the Commons. It was believed, he was either afraid of being called to an account, if he concealed from the Parliament an affair of such importance, which had passed thro' his hands, or was willing to ingratiate himself with that House, in which he had many powerful enemies. The King was highly provoked with a procedure so contrary to his orders and designs, and gave him a severe reprimand; but the thing was without remedy.

The Commons having communicated these informations to the Lords, laboured incessantly upon the affair of the Plot. For some days they sat from morning till late at night, and took extreme care to keep the Minutes and Votes of the House from being divulged. The Lords were no less diligent; so that in two or three days, both Houses presented three addresses to the King. The first was to pray him to appoint a Fast. The second to require the removal of all Popish Recusants out of London. The third to pray the King's order to the Lord Chamberlain, that no unknown person might have access to his Majesty.

It must be observed, these three addresses were all founded upon the discovery of the plot, and that both Houses did not confine it to the single design of killing the King, but expressly added the two others, of subverting the Government, and changing the established Religion. This is a remark which is to serve for the whole process of this affair. For never did the two Houses separate these three articles, a clear evidence that they believed the plot was not confined to the design of killing the King, as some would insinuate.

The same day that the third address was presented, namely the 24th of October, three days after the opening of the session, Oates was examined in the House of Commons six or seven hours. After his examination, he was several times interrogated, according to custom, Whether he knew any thing more of the plot, or any other persons concerned in it, than what he had already mentioned; to which he solemnly answered, He did not. And yet, he afterwards added several things to this deposition. As this is one of the objections against Oates's evidence, it will not be improper to inform the Reader of what has been said Pro and Con.

First, it is said, that Oates having been examined upon oath by the House of Commons, and having affirmed, he knew no more of the plot, could not afterwards add new depositions against other persons, without perjury. To im-

An objection to Oates's evidence.

(1) Dr. Lloyd and Dr. Turner went to view the body; and, besides the circumstances above-mentioned, observed, that his Shoes were clean. A mark round his neck an inch broad. His breast all over bruised, and his neck broken. There were many drops of white wax-lights on his breeches, which he never used himself. And since only persons of Quality or Priests use those lights, this made all people conclude in woful hands he must have been, p. 429.

(2) Sir Edmundbury's Corps being embalmed, was kept till October 31. when it was carried, in a very solemn manner, from Bridewell Hospital, of which he was one of the Governors, to the Church of St. Martin's in the Fields, where he was buried. The Pall was supported by eight Knights, all Justices of Peace. All the Aldermen of the City attended the Funeral. Seventy two London Ministers marched two and two before the body. And great multitudes followed after, in the same order. An excellent Sermon, suitable to the occasion, was preached, on a Samuel c. iii. v. 34. by Dr. William Lloyd, Vicar of St. Martin's. Relat. p. 332. Relat. 8cc.

16- prove this objection, it is said, he was solemnly interrogated, whether he knew any thing more; and that he answered as solemnly, he did not. But this word Solemnly is only used to aggravate the imputation of perjury. For it is easy to perceive, that a witness, at his first hearing, is not asked, whether he knows any thing more, with greater solemnity than the other questions, upon which he has deposed. It is besides replied to this objection, that the oath taken by Oates before he was interrogated, properly reached only to the facts which he was to depose, and not to the question after his deposition, whether he knew any thing more of the plot? So the charge of perjury vanishes, unless it be proved, that he was again sworn upon the last deposition.

It is answered in the second place, that this objection being made to Oates on another occasion, he said, that having been three days and three nights without sleep when he was examined by the Commons, and the examination lasting above six hours, it was not strange, that at the first hearing he should not recollect all he knew. I leave to the Reader to consider the objection and answer.

I cannot forbear observing here a fallacy put upon his Readers by a celebrated Historian, in saying, That he began so much to abound with new discoveries, that some began to suspect his veracity. Therefore, adds the Historian, in put an end to all such doubtings, on the 3rd of October, the Commons refused, Nemine contradicente, "That upon the evidence that has already appeared to this House, this House is of opinion, That there is, and hath been a damnable and hellish plot contrived and carried on by Popish Recusants, for assassinating and murdering the King, for subverting the Government, and rooting out and destroying the Protestant Religion."

Besides that this author, in ascribing for sole motive to the Commons the desire of putting an end to all doubtings of Oates's veracity, boldly accuses them of not acting uprightly, it may be demonstratively proved, that this could not be their motive, since the witness added nothing to his first deposition in the six days between his examination and the vote of the Commons. I was willing to make this remark, to shew, with what caution the Historians who have writ of the affairs of that time, must be read.

This vote having passed in the House of Commons, Nemine Contradicente, they ordered, "That this vote be communicated to the Lords at a conference, and that the Lords be desired to join with this House, in providing remedies for the preservation of his Majesty's Person and Government, and the Protestant Religion." Two days after, in a conference between the two Houses, upon the subject of the last vote of the Commons, this report was made, "The Lords have considered the vote of the House of Commons communicated to them at the conference, and have most readily and unanimously concurred with them in it, Nemine contradicente; and their Lordships are very glad to see that zeal which the Commons have shewed upon this occasion, and do fully concur with them, That the most speedy and serious considerations of both Houses are necessary for prevention of the imminent dangers. In order whereunto their Lordships have resolved to sit de die in diem, forenoon and afternoon, and desire that the House of Commons will do the same."

If this proves not the plot to be real, it proves at least, that both Houses believed it so, since there was not the least division upon this article. To deny therefore that the plot was real, it must be said, either that all the members of both Houses were grossly mistaken, or that they acted in a spirit of prejudice and party, to trouble the Court. But why should it be thought to trouble the Court, if the King was not suspected to have been the principal author of the plot, tho', doubtless, he was not concerned in the first article relating to the attempt upon his life, which, as I have said, was only an appendix of the plot, or at least was confounded as such.

The same day that the Commons examined Oates, they sent for the Lord Chief-Justice Scroggs, who took his examination upon oath, and in the House sealed twenty-six warrants for apprehending so many persons whom he had sworn against, among whom were the Lords Powis, Stafford, Arundel of Wardour, Petre, Belasis, and Sir Henry Tichbourn Baronet, all Papists, who were sent to the Tower, and the rest to several prisons.

The King was so persuaded of his being suspected, that he thought himself obliged to seem equally convinced with the Parliament of the danger. To remove therefore this suspicion, he published a Proclamation in these words: "The Lords and Commons having taken into their serious consideration, the bloody and traitorous designs of popish Recusants, against his Majesty's sacred Person and Government, and the Protestant Religion; therefore he commanded them all, except settled House-keepers that would take the oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy, to depart the cities of London and Wynminster, and all places within ten miles distant from the same."

The Papists accordingly departed out of London; though for so short a space, that in less than a fortnight they returned again, whether they had leave from their leaders to take the oaths, or knew such Proclamations were never strictly executed.

Besides this, the King knowing, that among his Foot and Horse guards, there were many Papists, and new converts to the Romish Religion, declared in Council, and published an order, with a promise of twenty pounds Sterling, to whoever should make discovery of any officer or soldier in his Horse or Foot guards, who having taken the oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy, and the late Test, had since been perverted to the Romish Religion.

The Commons not satisfied with these slight precautions, prepared a Bill to prevent the danger from so many Papists sitting in Parliament, and particularly in the House of Lords.

But this was only a preparative for the more effectual prevention of the danger with which Religion was threatened, from the hopes conceived by the Papists, of seeing the Duke of York on the throne after his brother, who neither had, nor expected to have, any legitimate issue. This danger caused several members of the Commons, to form the project of a Bill for excluding the Duke of York from the succession to the Crown: But this was done by degrees. On the 4th of November, a debate was suffered to arise in the House, for an address to his Majesty, that he would be pleased to remove the Duke of York from his person and counsels. But this debate was adjourned to the 8th, and afterwards to the 12th of the month.

The King perceiving the intent of the Commons, came to the Parliament the 9th of November, and sending for the Commons, made this Speech to both Houses,

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"I Am so very sensible of the great and extraordinary care you have already taken, and still continue to show, for the safety and preservation of my person in these times of danger, that I could not satisfy my self without coming hither on purpose to give you all my most hearty thanks for it. Nor do I think it enough to give you my thanks only, but I hold my self obliged to let you see withal, that I do as much study your preservation too, as I can possibly; and that I am as ready to join with you, in all the ways and means that may establish a firm security of the Protestant Religion, as your own hearts can wish: And this not only during my time, (of which I am sure you have no fear,) but in future ages, even to the end of the world. And therefore I am come to assure you, that whatever reasonable Bills you shall present to be passed into Laws, to make you safe in the reign of any successor, (so as they tend not to impeach the Right of Succession, nor the descent of the Crown in the true line, and so as they restrain not my power, nor the just Rights of any Protestant Successor) shall find from me a ready concurrence. And I desire you withal, to think of some more effectual means for the conviction of popish Recusants, and to expedite your counsels as fast as you can, that the world may see our unanimity, and that I may have the opportunity of shewing you, how ready I am to do any thing that may give comfort and satisfaction to such dutiful and loyal subjects."

During these transactions, one William Bedloe, who took upon him the title of Captain Bedloe, because he had served in the Low-Countries (1), going from London to Bristol, writ to the Secretary Cromwell from Newbury, that he had many secrets to discover, and therefore desired that he might be arreited on his arrival at Bristol, and sent to London. If I do not insert every thing said against Bedloe by certain Historians, it is their fault, because they have given no authority for what they advanced, nor do I think my self obliged to copy implicitly from authors who writ forty years after the events, and have not thought proper to alledge the least proof of what they assert. I shall however briefly say, that they speak of Bedloe as of the greatest villain that ever lived.

Bedloe was apprehended at Bristol, according to his desire, and brought to London the 6th of November, when the Parliament was very busy upon the affair of the plot.

(1) He had formerly been a servant to the Lord Belasis, afterwards a Captain in the English Army, and so by consequence, and sent frequently with Letters into foreign parts. He was also known by many false names, by which he had cheated many persons. He had gone over many parts of France, and was as a man of Quality. He had made a shift to live on his wife, of whom he was a cheat, p. 432.

1678. A guard was immediately assigned him for his security, and a pension for his subsistence, with a lodging at Whitehall. The King was present at his examination before the two Secretaries of State. He declared he had been bred a Protestant of the Church of England, but within two years persuaded to turn Catholic by the Jesuits. He said, He knew that Sir Edmundbury Godfrey was murdered in Somerset-House, but it is pretended, he solemnly declared upon oath, his ignorance of the plot then in question. But as I said, facts supported by no authority deserve little credit (1). It is added, that the very next day, being examined by the House of Lords, he thought fit upon new encouragement, to be more upon, and launch out into the depths of the plot, with a new and supplemental evidence. It is easy to perceive the tendency of such insinuations destitute of authority.

Edward.

His Deposition.

However this be, Bedloe declared to the Lords, that Walsh and le Phaire, two Jesuits concerned in the murder of Godfrey, informed him, "That the Lord Bellasis had a commission to command forces in the North, the Earl of Powis in South-Wales, and the Lord Arundel of Wardour had a commission from the Pope to grant commissions to whom he pleased: That Coleman had been a great agitator in the design against the King." He was asked, if he knew Oates, and he positively denied it, but pretended afterwards, he knew him by the name of Ambrose.

The next day, the two Houses obtained from the King a Proclamation against Walsh, le Phaire, Conyers, Simmonds, Pritchard, and Coffinway, but none of them could be found.

He found Deposition.

The 12th of November, Bedloe was examined a second time in the House of Lords. The substance of what he said was, "That the monks of Douay first told him the design; and, after four sacraments of secrecy, they sent him to Harcourt, a Jesuit in Duke-street, London, who provided for him, and sent him to Paris, &c. That le Phaire, Walsh, Pritchard, and Lewis, told him what Lords were to govern, what men were to be raised; particularly forty thousand to be ready in London: What succours were to be expected, namely, ten thousand from Flanders, twenty or thirty thousand religious men and pilgrims from St. Jago in Spain; that Hull was to be surprized; and that, just in the critical time that the plot was discovered; that le Phaire gave him a sacrament of secrecy; and they told him, who and who were to be killed, and the men that were to do the work. Le Phaire said further, that Conyers was my Lord Bellasis's Confessor, and communicated his orders; and that they were resolved, if any plotters were taken, to dispatch them before they could be brought to trial, or to burn the prison. That le Phaire, Pritchard, Lewis, Keins, and Walsh, and others, had often told him, that there was not a Roman Catholic in England of any quality or credit, but was acquainted with this design of the Papists, and had received the sacrament from their Father-Confessors, to be secret and assistant in the carrying of it on: That the part assigned him, was to bring and carry orders and counsels, and all other intelligences from one army to another upon all occasions, he knowing every part and road of England and Wales."

After this deposition, the Lords having conjured Bedloe to speak nothing but the truth, he did in the presence of God, as he should answer it at the day of judgment, assure all to be true he had deposed.

Bedloe's deposition, which was communicated to the Commons, was very apt to fill the Parliament and People with fears. Accordingly the effect of it was such, that the King, to avoid being suspected of having any hand in the plot, published a Proclamation the 12th of November, "Whereby all Romish Recusants, and such reputed, were enjoined under the penalty of the Laws, to repair to their own houses, and not to remove more than five miles from thence without licence." But the Commons did not think this Proclamation sufficient to free them from their fears. The same day they presented an address to the King, praying, "That a special commission may be issued forth, for tendering the oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy to all the servants of his Majesty, and his Royal Highness, and to all other persons, (except her Majesty's Portugal servants) residing within the Palaces

"of Whitehall, St. James's, and Somerset-house, and all other his Majesty's houses; and that there may be likewise special commissions issued forth, for tendering the said oaths to all persons residing within the two Serjeants-Inns, all the Inns of Court, and Inns of Chancery." The King returned an answer in writing, that he granted their request, with exception of the menial servants of the Queen and Dukes, who were so very considerable in their number, and within the articles of marriage. He added, That he could not but take notice, that in a late address from the House of Peers, the menial servants of the Queen and Dukes were excepted, and that he hoped the Commons would proceed with the same moderation as to that particular. This answer was not satisfactory, and therefore they insisted in a second address, "That the persons excepted in his Majesty's message, might be comprehended in the same commission, for which they gave some reasons." But before the King had answered this address, there happened an accident which put the Commons much out of temper.

His Answer.

The 18th of November, they were informed, that several commissions had been granted to popish Recusants, and warrants also, that they should be mustered, notwithstanding they had not taken the oaths, and subscribed the declaration according to the Act of Parliament; and that they were counter-signed by Sir Joseph Williamson, Secretary of State. Upon this information, Williamson, [as a member of their House,] was immediately sent to the Tower. This much offended the King, who the next day sent for the Commons to attend him in the Banqueting-house in Whitehall, where in a Speech he told them plainly, "That though they had committed his servant, without acquainting him; yet he intended to deal more freely with them, and acquaint them with his intention to release his Secretary;" which accordingly he did that very day. Upon this the Commons presented an address to the King, with the reasons of their proceedings in the commitment of his Secretary. They said, "1. That divers commissions were granted to popish officers, and counter-signed by the said Sir Joseph Williamson, and delivered out in October last, since the meeting of this House, and the discovery of the present popish Conspiracy."

The Commons send Secretary Williamson to the Tower.

"2. Divers Warrants have also been produced before us of Dispensations, contrary to Law, for popish officers to continue their commands, and to be passed in muster, notwithstanding they have not taken the oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy, and received the blessed Sacrament of the Lord's-Supper, according to the late Act of Parliament in that behalf; all which said Warrants were likewise counter-signed by the said Williamson; which being complained of to us, and confessed by the said Sir Joseph Williamson, We your Majesty's most dutiful Subjects, having the immediate consideration before us, of the imminent danger of your Majesty's person, the safety whereof is above all things most dear to us, and likewise the dangers from popish Plots so nearly threatening the peace and safety of your Majesty's Government, and the Protestant Religion, we humbly are of opinion, we could not discharge our duty to your Majesty, and the whole Kingdom, without committing the said Sir Joseph Williamson; and therefore most humbly desire, That he may be discharged by your Majesty. And we do further most humbly desire your Majesty, to recall all commissions granted to all Papists within the Kingdom of England and Ireland, or any other of your Majesty's dominions and territories."

To this the King answered, "That he had released Mr. Secretary Williamson before their address came, and promised to recall all his commissions whatsoever given to Papists, or reputed Papists."

Had not the King had some secret design, it must be owned, he ill-timed these commissions while the popish Plot made so much noise, and the Parliament was employed in examining into it. But this is a mystery which is not yet cleared. However, the affair was carried no farther.

About this time, the Bill to disable Papists from sitting in Parliament, passed the Commons, and afterwards the Lords, though with more difficulty (2). The King likewise published a Proclamation, offering a reward to any one who should discover or apprehend a Romish Priest or Jesuit.

A Proclamation against Romish Priests or Jesuits.

Kennet.

Edward.

(1) Burnet says, he declared, he had only heard that forty thousand men were to come over from Spain, who were to meet at St. Jago's as Pilgrims, but knew nothing of any Plot being on foot.

(2) Kennet says, The Commons voted 120 to 40 for the Bill, that they would introduce a Bill, upon which the safety of the King and Kingdom, and the freedom on it; else, they would think themselves unable to prepare any effectual remedies, to prevent the evils that hung over them. p. 377. Edward, on the other hand, says, the Bill passed the House of Lords with some little amendments, and a particular clause in favour of the Duke of York. But the great struggle about it was chiefly in the House of Commons when it was first brought in. But the great struggle about it was chiefly in the House of Commons when it was first brought in.

Trelawny and Mr. Ash being violently heated, and opprobrious words passing between them, Sir Jonathan gave Asha a box on the ear, which being returned by the Speaker, the House adjourned. This Bill consisted of a Test against Popery, in which Transubstantiation was not only renounced, but the worship of the Virgin Mary and the Saints, as practised in the Church of Rome, was declared to be idolatrous. Gunning, Bishop of Ely, maintained the Church of Rome was not idolatrous. He was answered by Barlow, Bishop of Lincoln. However, Gunning took the Test. The Duke spoke on the Clause for excepting himself, with tears in his eyes, protesting, that whatever his Religion might be, it should only be a private thing between God and his own Soul, and no effect of it should ever appear in the Government. Burnet, p. 435.

No. 78. VOL. II.

1678. Mean while, the King finding the Commons delayed to grant him money, came to the Parliament, and after a repetition of some things delivered in his first Speech, he desired them, either to grant him money to continue his forces in Flanders, or to disband them. Whereupon, the Commons, who saw with uneasiness, so formidable an army on foot in such a juncture, resolved, Nemine contradicente, "That all the forces raised since the 29th of September 1677, should be disbanded." To which purpose they presented an address to his Majesty.

At the same time, the Commons had before them a Bill, For raising a third part of the Militia to be in constant arms for a time, which with amendments was sent up to the Lords, and passed their House.

The 30th of November the King gave the royal assent to the Bill, For disabling Papists from sitting in either House of Parliament, and showed himself very willing to recal his forces from Flanders. But the Militia-bill he absolutely rejected, alledging, That it was to put the Militia out of his power, which thing he would not do, no not for one hour; but if the Commons would assist him with money for that purpose, he would take care to raise such a part of the Militia as should secure the peace of the Government and his own person. But the Parliament thought not fit to accept his offer.

Since the King had seen the unanimity of the two Houses concerning the reality of the plot, he had thought proper to reign a no less fear of the danger the Church and State were in. And this is what Father Orleans can hardly forgive him, saying, his dissimulation was made use of to the committing of much injustice. But the King found himself in no condition to oppose the torrent, which run so violently against the Papists. His whole policy was confined to his endeavours to remove the suspicion of his being concerned in the plot, which he saw both Houses were too apt to believe. So, without unseasonably affecting an indiscreet zeal for a Religion which he publicly disowned, he calmly left the Papists exposed to the resentment of the Parliament, for fear of his own ruin by an opposite conduct. For this reason it was, that he suffered the Conspirators to be brought to their trials (1).

Edward Coleman, Secretary to the Duke of York was first tried, the 27th of November, at the King's-Bench bar, before the Lord-Chief-Justice Scroggs. The witnesses produced against him were Oates and Bedloe. The first deposed,

"1. That in November 1677, being brought acquainted with the prisoner by Father John Keim, then the deponent's confessor, who lodged at Mr. Coleman's house, he carried some Letters from him to St. Omers, which he saw opened when he came there. In them were treasonable expressions against the King, calling him tyrant, &c. And a letter in Latin enclosed to Father la Chaise, to whom Oates carried it from St. Omers to Paris; in which there were thanks returned for the ten thousand pounds by him remitted to England, for the propagation of the Catholick Religion, and promising it should be employed for no other purpose, but that for which it was sent, namely, To cut off the King of England, as appeared by the letter of la Chaise, to which all this was an answer, and which Oates saw and read.

"2. That Coleman was concerned in the design of killing the King; for when, at the Jesuits great consult, on the 24th of April, which afterwards divided into several clubs, it was resolved that Pickering and Grove should take off his Majesty by shooting, or other means; this resolve was communicated to Coleman, in Oates's hearing, at Wild-house, who did approve thereof, and said, It is well contrived.

"3. That in August 1678, Coleman was present at a consult with the Jesuits and Benedictine Monks at the Savoy, for raising a Rebellion in Ireland, for which forty thousand Black Bills as arms were provided; and was very forward to have Dr. Fegarty sent over to poison the Duke of Ormond: And at another time, being in Fenwick's chamber, in Drury-Lane, Coleman said to him in Oates's hearing, That he had found a way to transmit two hundred thousand pounds to carry on the Rebellion in Ireland.

"4. That in the month of August, Coleman knew of the four Irish ruffians sent to kill the King at Windor; and in Oates's hearing, asked Father Harcourt at Wild-house, What care was taken for those Gentlemen that went last night to Windor? Who replied, That eighty pounds was ordered them, which he saw there on the Table, most of it in Guineas; and that Coleman was so zealous that he gave a Guinea to the messenger who was to carry the money, to expedite the business.

"5. That in July 1678, Coleman was privy to the instructions brought by Ahley, Rector of St. Omers, from Father Whitebread, to empower the confutors to propose ten thousand pounds to Sir George Wakeman to poison the King, provided Pickering and Grove failed to do the work: That Coleman had read and copied those instructions, and transmitted them to several others of the conspirators, who were gathering contributions about the Kingdom, who would be more encouraged to give largely, both because they were assured the business would soon be dispatched, and that they might see they had assistance from beyond seas; and that Coleman was so far from disappointing this treason, that he said, It was too little, and thought it necessary to give five thousand pounds more, to make the business sure.

"6. That in April 1678, Oates saw Coleman's patent or commission to be Secretary of State, from Paulus de Oliva, General of the Society of Jesuits, by virtue of a brief from the Pope, and he knew the hand perfectly well; and in Fenwick's chamber he saw Coleman open it, and heard him say, It was a good Exchange. Last of all Oates being asked how many came over in April to the grand consult, and how many Priests and Jesuits had been in England at one time? He said, He could not exactly remember their numbers, but, to his knowledge, there had been in England at the same time, a hundred and sixty secular Priests, eighty Jesuits, and by name in the catalogue about three hundred.

Bedloe deposed,

"1. That he knew not of any commission to Mr. Coleman; but that Sir Henry Tichbourn had told him, "That he brought a commission for him to be principal Secretary of State, when he brought over the rest of the commissions for the Lords and others, from the principal Jesuits at Rome, by order of the Pope.

"2. That in April 1675, he carried over a large packet of letters from Coleman to Father la Chaise, about carrying on the plot, and brought back an answer: And on May the 24th or 25th, 1677, he received another packet of Coleman's, to carry to Paris to the English Monks; and that he had received money to carry on the design to subvert the Government of England, to free England from domination and ignorance, and to free all Catholics from the hard tyranny and oppression of Hereticks.

"3. That upon Bedloe's return with answers to the last letters, which were delivered to Coleman by Harcourt, he heard the prisoner, at his House behind Westminster Abbey, at the foot of the stair-case, say, If he had a hundred lives, and a Sea of blood to carry on the cause, he would spend it all to establish the Church of Rome in England; and if there was an hundred Heretical Kings to be deposed, he would fee them all destroyed. Upon this saying, Mr. Coleman asked him this question, Did I ever see you in my life? Yes, said the other, in the stone gallery in Somerset-house, when you came from a consult, where were great persons, which I am not to name here; that would make the bottom of your plot tremble: You saw me then.

The third evidence against Coleman was his own letters, found in his lodgings when he was arrested. But it must be observed that only those of the years 1674 and 1675, were found in a drawer under the table (2). The general opinion was, that he had received notice of his being accused by Oates in the Council, and so had time to burn or convey away those of the two last years, with the book in which they were entered. However this be, the following extracts are taken from some of his letters writ with his own hand, and allowed to be authentick.

Extract from a Letter of Mr. Coleman to Father la Chaise the 29th of June, 1674.

"I Am commanded to tell you, that his Royal Highness, my master, is very sensible of the friendship of his most Christian Majesty, which he will endeavour to cultivate very carefully, and to give him all possible assurances of it, to take away all jealousies that his enemies would raise to the contrary. That his Royal Highness has done nothing in any manner whatsoever, nor in any place, against the interest of his most Christian Majesty, but hath rendered him all the good offices he hath been capable of. That as for recalling the Parliament, and touching my Lord Arlington, his Highness is altogether of opinion of his Majesty, that neither one or other is useful, but quite contrary, very dangerous as well for England as France; and that his most Christian Majesty is in great danger of losing the neutrality of England, at the next session, (if the Parliament meet)

"as he lost its alliance by the peace of Holland at last; because the Lower-House and their friends (as the furious Protestants, and the Male-contents in the House of Lords) have a design to lessen his Royal Highness, and root out the Catholic Religion; and they think they cannot make use of any other fitter means to attain their ends, than to raise the Dutch, and to perplex his most Christian Majesty, as much as lies in their power. That his Highness doubts not, but it is absolutely necessary for the interest of his most Christian Majesty, and his Royal Highness, to use all endeavours to hinder the meeting of the Parliament, by persuading his Britannick Majesty, that his greatness, his honour, and his quiet, are no less concerned therein than theirs: So that if his most Christian Majesty would write freely his thoughts thereupon to his Britannick Majesty, to forewarn him of the danger he apprehends from thence, and would withal think fit to make him the same generous offers of his purse, to persuade him to dissolve the present Parliament, as he hath done to his Highness for the election of another, perhaps he would succeed therein by the assistance we would give him here. As for another Parliament, it would be easy enough to get such a one as we wish for; the constitutions of our Parliaments being of such a nature, that as there is nothing to be hoped for by the King from an old one, so there is nothing to be feared from a new one; because such a one, at their first meeting, must needs assist his Majesty, so far as to enable him to acknowledge his obligations both to his most Christian Majesty and to all the world."

There was in the year 1674, a prorogation of the Parliament, which lasted fourteen months: It appears in this letter, that the interests of the King of France and the Popish Religion were the true cause of this long prorogation.

Extract from a Letter of Mr. Coleman to Father la Chaise, September 25, 1674.

"FOR the first point of your letter, his Royal Highness has commanded me to tell you, that he will govern himself according to your advice, and treat of nothing concerning the Catholic Religion with Monsieur Rouvigny, nor with any other person than your self; but that he will communicate to you all things he shall find necessary for the good of the Catholics, and shall be very well pleased to receive advices from you thereupon. For the rest, his Royal Highness does a little wonder, that he hears nothing from Monsieur Rouvigny touching the second point of your letter, since you have written so positively that he had order to confirm, and procure execution of what his most Christian Majesty proposed to him the 2d of June last, by your mediation. — His most Christian Majesty made a very generous offer to his Royal Highness of the assistance of his purse, to enable him to defend them both from the evils that threatened them, and by good luck his Royal Highness has laboured with so much diligence and success, that the dangers which they apprehended are a little put off: But one thing more is necessary for the perfect securing their affairs; and without making one step more, all that he has already done will signify nothing. For that the assistance of his most Christian Majesty is no less necessary at present than heretofore, to subdue entirely those, who being exasperated against his most Christian Majesty, as much as against his royal Highness, and are angry with his royal Highness, only because he is so unalterably addicted to the interest of his most Christian Majesty, will exercise their malice and their rage with more brutality than ever, if they find occasion for it hereafter. If you can therefore, by your credit, obtain from his most Christian Majesty the accomplishment of the offer of his Purse, for raising the reputation of his Royal Highness in the opinion of his Britannick Majesty, and for putting him in condition to resist the sharpest batteries of the adversaries of his most Christian Majesty, and Royal Highness, to wit, the possibility they pretend to get money from the Parliament, and the impossibility of having any elsewhere, by which they often keep the mind of his Britannick Majesty in suspense, and wherein they place the hope they have to conquer him at last: There will nothing more remain, to be feared by his most Christian Majesty, or his Royal Highness, but his Royal Highness will be able to dissolve the Parliament with ease, and afterwards, in recompence of the said assistance, will perform on his part, all that his most Christian Majesty shall ask of him, and will proceed with sincerity, upon the word of a Prince, (that no man can reproach him for violation of) for the interest of his most Christian Majesty."

Extract from a Letter of Mr. Coleman to the Pope's Nuncio at Brussels, September 4, 1674.

"THAT the Duke's principal design is, to use the Pope's interposition, and by that means to establish himself in the possession of his Estate, through the assistance of France and Spain, and to turn all their cares for the ease of the Pope's friends, and particularly for the Catholics of the Church, against their enemies; and assures him he will find, that the Pope never had an occasion so favorable as at this hour, to enrich those of his family, and to augment the number of his friends; and if he lets it slip, he never will find the like: So that if ever they propose to make use of the treasure of the Church, it is now they ought to do it; for they can demand nothing that the Duke will not be capable to do for the Pope's friends: — On the other side, without their aid, he will run great hazard of being lost, both himself and his associates."

Extract of a Letter from Mr. Coleman to the same Nuncio, written October 23, 1674.

"YOU agree with me, that money is the only means of bringing the King into the Duke's interest, and of disengaging him from the Parliament; and you must also agree with me, that nothing can more promote the interests of the Catholic party, which is the principal object of the Duke's care and affection, and of the hatred of the Parliament, and which must hope, or fear, according as the one or the other of them increase in power. — Nothing in the world is more certain, than that the King has a good inclination towards the Duke, and the Catholics, and would join himself willingly and inseparably to their interests, if he did not apprehend some danger from such a union; which, however, he would not have cause to fear, if he found their interest, and consequently their power, so far advanced above that of their adversaries, that they should neither have the power nor the boldness to contest any thing with them; which the King could see in a very little time, if we could persuade him to do two or three things: — And I am certain money could not fail of persuading him to it; for there is nothing it cannot make him do, though it were as much to his prejudice, as this we endeavour to persuade him to will be to his advantage."

In another letter, Coleman, positively said, "That it was by the credit of the Catholics, that the Parliament was prorogued till the 13th day of April 1675."

Extract from a Letter of Mr. Coleman, to Father la Chaise.

"OUR prevailing in these things will give the greatest blow to the Protestant Religion here, that ever it received since its birth."

In Another.

"WE have here a mighty work upon our hands, no less than the conversion of three Kingdoms, and by that perhaps the subduing of a Pesteilent Heresy, which has domineered over great part of this Northern world a long time; there were never such hopes of success since the death of Queen Mary, as now in our days."

In the same Letter.

"THE opposition we are sure to meet with is also like to be great; so that it imports us to get all the aid and assistance we can. For the harvest is great, and the labourers but few." — After the reading of these letters, Coleman alleged in his defence.

1. That Oates, who now pretended such acquaintance with him, declared before the King and Council, "That he never saw him before, or did not know him."

To which the other answered, "That it being candle-light, and his sight weak, and Coleman altered in habit and wig, he did at first say, he could not swear that was the man, or that he had ever seen him before; but as soon as he heard him speak, he knew him well, and could have then sworn it, had it been demanded."

2. That had the things now alleged by Oates been true, he would have charged the same before the Council: But then he only charged him with the sending of one letter, and such slender matters, that the Council was ready to let him go at large; and therefore all the rest must be invented since."

To this Oates replied, "That he was then so weak and weary, he could not well tell what he said; besides, his design was then to lay no more to his charge, than might serve for information, &c."

3. Whereas

1678. "3. Whereas Oates charged him with consenting to "Wakeman's poisoning of the King, and that it was consulted by him in August, and, as he remembered, about the 21st day, Coleman alleged, that he was then in Warwickshire, and one of his men and he were there all August, as he thought, but was not sure of it; and after conviction, he offered a book that would shew he was out of town from the 18th, to the 31st of August;" But this was no evidence in itself, and offered too late, so it did not contradict Oates, who was not positive to a day, but only to the month. As to what was sworn by Bedloe, he made no other answer than a solemn asseveration, That he never saw the man in his life. But as to his papers, which he did not deny, he alleged, "There was no Treason in them, tho' very extravagant expressions; and that it would plainly appear from them, that his design was so far from killing the King, that it was only to make the King and Duke as great as could be."

1. It is proper to remark upon this last answer, that according to Oates's deposition, the resolution to kill the King was taken but the 24th of April 1678, and these letters were of the years 1674, and 1675; consequently they could not mention the design of killing the King, neither were they produced in proof of that article.

2. Oates had accused Coleman of being concerned in the plot, before his letters were found. How then, if he did not know Coleman, could he guess so right, as to lay things to his charge, which were found in letters under his own hand?

3. Coleman owned, that his intention was to make the King and Duke of York as great as was possible. This was a necessary consequence of the projected change of Religion. For it was not possible to subvert Religion, without a subversion of the Government, nor to render the King absolute, without a design of altering Religion, since the King and Duke were both Catholics. One of these articles proved, necessarily proves the other.

In the conclusion of his defence, he used these words; Possibly I say, and upon my salvation, I never saw these Wits. Oates but once, and Bedloe never before.

The jury, who were all Gentlemen of the county of Middlesex, against whom Coleman had made no exceptions, withdrawing, in a little time brought him in guilty of High-Treason. The day after he received sentence of death, and the 3d of December was hanged and quartered according to custom. He persisted to the last moment in the denial of the crimes for which he was condemned. But as his letters seemed at least to prove a design of extirpating the Protestant Religion, he declared his sole intention was to procure Liberty of Conscience for the Papists. Probably it will not be universally agreed, that this is the natural sense of the expressions in his letters. It is true, a report was spread in London, that he was promised a pardon, in case he made no confession; but such Rumours are not much to be credited (1).

The same day that Coleman was tried, the King at the request of the Lords, published a proclamation, promising, "That if any person or persons shall, before the 25th day of December next, make any farther discovery of the late horrid design against his Majesty's Person and Government, he or they shall not only receive from his Majesty for every such discovery, the reward of two hundred pounds; but if he or they were a principal or principals in the said design, they shall have his Majesty's gracious pardon."

Whether through a desire of having this reward, or that they believed to have a good foundation, Oates and Bedloe had the boldness before the King and Council to accuse the Queen herself, of consenting to the death of the King, and of being in the design to poison him by means of Wakeman. But, besides that their depositions contained only certain signs which were far from proofs, the King stopped this affair by his authority. But he could not prevent an address from the Commons, to desire the immediate removal of the Queen and her Family from the Court at Whitehall. The King was so offended at Oates's insinuation, that he ordered a stricter guard upon him than ever. But the day after, the Commons addressed him, "That Oates be freed from his restraint, attended by his own servants, and that a competent allowance be appointed for his maintenance." At the same time, they resolved, that an address be presented to his Majesty, that all Papists and suspected Papists within the several counties of England may be secured.

The 6th of December, they impeached the five Lords in the Tower, at the Bar of the House of Peers. But they had not time to exhibit the articles against them, and the affair was resumed by another House of Commons.

The 17th of December were arraigned at the Old Baily State-Trial, five of those arrested for the plot, namely, William Ireland, and Thomas Pickering, both Priests; John Grove a Lay-brother, Thomas Whitebread Provincial of the Jesuits, and John Fenwick a Jesuit also. But in the course of the evidence, there not appearing sufficient proof against the two last, they were referred for another time. So, the three first only were tried that day. The sum of Oates's evidence against them was:

1. That at the grand consults of April the 24th, at the White-Horse in the Strand, whereof Ireland was one; it was resolved, that Pickering and Grove, as having been formerly engaged, should go on in their design and attempt to assassinate the King; and that Grove being a layman, should have fifteen hundred pounds for his reward; and Pickering being a Priest, thirty thousand Males, which at twelve-pence a Male, amounted to that sum.

2. That this resolve was the same day drawn up in writing by one Mico, that was Secretary to the Society, and companion to Provincial Whitebread, at the said Whitebread's chamber, who having signed it, it was carried by the deponent Oates, as being a messenger to the consult, to be signed by the rest of the colloquies; and that Ireland in his own chamber did sign it in his presence.

3. That Pickering and Grove consented to such resolve, accepted the terms, and also signed it the same day in Whitebread's chamber, at Mrs. Sander's at Wild-House, where, in a little chapel, they, and about forty or fifty of the consulters heard Mass, and received the Sacrament, administered by one Barton, a Jesuit, and thereupon took an oath of secrecy upon a Mass-book, which Mico held, while Whitebread pronounced the words.

4. That in pursuance of this resolve, the deponent did several times see Pickering and Grove walk in the Park together, with skewed pistols, longer than ordinary pistols, and shorter than some carbines: That they had silver bullets champed, to render the wound incurable, and that he saw Grove's bullets in May, and Pickering's in August: Moreover,

5. That before the consult, in the month of March, Pickering had a fair opportunity to shoot the King; but the flint of his pistol happened to be loose, and he durst not venture to give fire; and because by their negligence this opportunity was missed, Pickering underwent Penance, and had twenty or thirty strokes of Discipline, and Grove was chidden for his carelessness, as the deponent had seen in Whitebread's letters.

6. That Grove did go about with one Smith, to gather Peter-Pence, either to carry on the design, or to send to Rome: That he saw the book wherein it was entered, and heard the said Grove say, He had been gathering it.

Bedloe the second witness swore,

1. That he was employed for the space of five years as a messenger, by the conspirators, for carrying their letters to the confederates beyond Seas, and bringing others back, all, or most of them relating to the plot; for he had a way to open and read them, by which he fully informed himself of those matters: And for the nature of the Plot; he heard some of the conspirators say, That they would not leave any member of any Heretick in England, that should survive to tell hereafter, That there ever was any such Religion in England, as the Protestant. And to confirm his intimacy with them, he swore the manner of his first coming to be employed by them; by means of a Lady Abbels of the English Nunnery of Dunkirk, who having kept him six weeks in her Convent, recommended him to Sir John Warner, as a proper instrument, who afterwards sent him to Father Harcourt to be instructed. And as a further confirmation, he brought his brother James Bedloe, who swore he knew nothing of the Plot, but did testify, "That he had heard the prisoners often named as being of his brother's acquaintance; and that he had, on his brother's behalf, received several sums of money from Priests and Jesuits, as fifty or sixty pounds at a time."

2. That about the latter end of August, this year, at Mr. Harcourt's chamber, he met the prisoners, Ireland, Pickering and Grove, with some others, where he heard them discourse, That since the four Irish Ruffians had missed killing the King at Windford, Pickering and Grove

(1) He declared before the Committee, that he had acted by order in all he had done. And he believed the King knew of his employment, particularly that at Brussels. But tho' he seemed willing to be questioned about the King, the Committee did not think fit to do it, nor to report what he said concerning it. In general, they reported that, he spoke of another matter, about which they did not think fit to interrogate him, nor to mention it. Lit. crit. one of the Committee, gave Dr. Barnes an account of all that passed very night. And he found his behaviour made great impressions on them all: It was given out, to make the Duke more odious, that Coleman was kept up from making Confession, by the hopes the Duke had of a pardon at Tyburn. B. he could not be so ignorant, as not to know, that at that time it was not in the King's power to pardon him, while the tide ran so high. Barnes, p. 45.

"should go on with their design, and that one Conyers, a Benedictine Monk, was to be joined with them; and that they should endeavour to assassinate his Majesty in his morning walks at Newmarket; That they were very eager upon it; and Mr. Grove, more forward than the rest, said, since it could not be done clandestinely, it should be attempted openly; and that those who should fall in the attempt, had the glory to dye in a good cause; but if they were discovered, the discovery could never come to that height, but their party would be strong enough to bring it to pass.

"3. He swore that Harcourt told him, Grove was to have fifteen hundred pounds, and Pickering as many Maffes, at twelve pence a Maff, as came to the like sum.

"4. That at the same time, when the discourse about killing the King was at Harcourt's chamber, there was likewise a design concerted amongst them of killing several noble persons, and the particular parts assigned to every one; as Knights, to kill the Earl of Shaftsbury; Pritchard, the Duke of Buckingham; Onell, the Earl of Offory; Obrian, the Duke of Ormond, &c.

The defence made by the prisoners consisted in:

"1. A peremptory denial of the whole. Grove particularly said, As I have a soul to save, I know nothing of this matter charged upon me. Pickering affirmed, that he never shot off a pistol in his life. And Whitebread, who was there during the trial, declared before Almighty God, that Oates had not spoken three words of truth.

"2. A particular denial of their knowledge of, or acquaintance with, the witnesses. Ireland denied that he ever saw Bedloe, before that time in the Court; and challenged him to produce one witness that he had ever spoken to him. Pickering affirmed, that he never saw Oates before; and offered to swear that he never was in Bedloe's company. And Grove affirmed, that he had scarce any acquaintance with Oates. Whereupon Oates gave him a remarkable token, viz. that in December last, when he was with him, he owned, that he and three Irishmen had fired Southwark; and that they had a thousand pounds given them for it; whereas he had four hundred pounds, and the others two hundred pounds a piece.

"3. Ireland, against Bedloe's evidence, affirmed, he was not in London the whole month of August, and part of September; and offered to prove it by twenty witnesses, that he was in Staffordshire and Cheshire all that time; and urged Bedloe to name the place, and the company wherever they met together. But not only Bedloe swore the contrary, but likewise Oates himself; but what seemed more important, one Sarah Pain, formerly a servant to Grove, swore that the law Mr. Ireland at a Scrivener's door in Petter-Lane, about the 12th or 13th of August.

"4. Ireland, as well as Whitebread, objected against the grand consil of April the 24th, that hundreds could prove that Oates was at St. Omers all the months of April and May; and offered to produce a certificate from thence, under the seal of the College. But such certificate was not allowed as evidence by the law of England. Lastly, they endeavoured to blast the reputation of Doctor Oates, and prove him perjured, since he had said before the Council, that he knew no more than what he had already deposed, and yet had since added other testimonies. As I have spoken of this objection, I shall not repeat here what has been said.

In conclusion, all three were found guilty, and sentenced to be drawn, hanged and quartered. But the execution of Ireland and Grove, was deferred till the 24th of January following, and that of Pickering to the 9th of May. They persisted all three to their last breath, to protest they were as innocent of the crimes for which they were condemned, as the child unborn. As all the Papists that suffered for this conspiracy made use of the same manner of expression, to declare their innocence, it was believed, there was some equivocation in these words, though it could not be said wherein it consisted.

If it is considered, that the evidence of Oates and Bedloe upon oath was positive, and that the prisoners alledged in their defence only bare negations, the Jury will be easily justified in their verdict. For why should they credit the asseverations and oaths of the accused, more than the depositions of the two witnesses? And yet, it was afterwards, and still is, pretended by many, that the condemned persons were innocent. 1. Because they asserted their innocence with their dying breath. 2. Because it is taken for granted that Oates and Bedloe were great villains. 3. But the strongest proof, according to those who are of this opinion, is, that it was upon the trial of these three, then 1678. that Oates in the Reign of King James the Second, was convicted of perjury upon the depositions of twenty two witnesses from St. Omers, who swore that Oates was at St. Omers, in the Jesuits College, the whole months of April and May, without ever stirring from thence. Moreover, above forty witnesses from the counties of Stafford and Cheshire, deposed upon oath, that Father Ireland was in those counties all August, and part of September.

To assist the Reader to judge of this affair, I think it necessary to make some remarks, and the rather, as the dispute upon this subject is not yet ended.

1. The defence by the Alibi (1) is liable to great inconveniences, since, there being two contradictory evidences, it leaves the Judges doubtful what to resolve. Generally if they come to a determination, it is not because there is reason to believe one of the evidences more than the other, but because equity requires that they incline rather to clemency than rigour. In the present trial, there were no depositions in favour of the Alibi, but only a bare allegation of the prisoners, and an offer of proof by absent witnesses. So, even supposing the innocence of the three accused persons, the Jury could not but find them guilty, unless they preferred the bare asseveration of the prisoners, to the oaths of the witnesses, which is never practised. But in the trial of Oates, the proof of the Alibi was made use of to convict him of perjury, and sentence him for it to a very rigorous punishment. It belongs to the Lawyers to decide, whether this be exactly regular.

2. If the circumstances of the times of these two trials are considered, it will be found, there is as much reason to believe, in respect of one as of the other, that prejudice and passion bore a great sway. When the three Jesuits were condemned, the whole Kingdom was alarmed with the noise of a Plot, formed by that Society against the King, the Government, and the Protestant Religion. The two Houses of Parliament had supported the reality of this plot, by the unanimity of their votes, and the King himself supported it in all his proclamations. It should not therefore be strange, that the Judges and Jury were prejudiced, and thereby inclined blindly to believe what Oates and Bedloe deposed. But on the other hand, when Oates was convicted of perjury, the face of things was entirely changed. A very zealous Catholic King was on the Throne, and it was now dangerous to affirm, there was a Popish Plot in 1678. The Papists had now the same superiority over the Protestants, as the Protestants had in 1678 over the Catholics, and the Judges were entirely devoted to the King. It suffices to say in a word, that Jesuries was his Judge, who forgot nothing which he thought capable to prejudice the Jury against the prisoner. In short, Oates was condemned upon the evidence of twenty two witnesses from St. Omers, all scholars or dependents of the Jesuits, and upon that of forty other witnesses from the counties of Cheshire and Stafford, amongst whom it is only said there were several Protestants. Moreover, the question was not only, whether Ireland was in those counties during the months of August and September, but whether he had never stirred from thence in that time (2). Now it is hard to conceive that such a negative proposition can be proved by forty witnesses.

Having thus represented what is urged on both sides, I leave the Reader to his own judgment. The affair of the conspiracy must now be interrupted for some time, in order to proceed to another which made a great noise at this time. But it is necessary to look back a little on the situation of the English Court.

The Earl of Danby Lord-Treasurer, was considered as the King's Prime Minister. He had a great genius, and Danby's as a solid judgment, and as he disapproved of the principles of the Cabal, endeavoured to disengage the King from the methods, he had been led into by their counsels. This drew upon him the enmity of the Duke of York, and all the French Faction, with whom joined the Lord Ruffel, and other Male-contents in the House of Commons; and among the Peers, the Earls of Essex and Shaftsbury, whilst the Duke of Monmouth, and the Duchess of Portsmouth did their utmost to lessen his credit with the King. In a word, a strong party was formed against him, who were bent to ruin him at any rate. These enemies were also joined by another, who had been his most intimate friend. This was Mr. Montague Ambassador in France, who aspiring to the office of Secretary of State, took it very ill, that the Treasurer had engaged to bring in Sir William Temple. Mr. Montague was the Treasurer's most dangerous enemy, because he had private letters in his hands from that Minister, and though he could not divulge them without great injury to the King, this gave him no uneasiness, because, resolving to throw himself into the party against the Court,

(1) The proof of the Alibi, is, that whereby the Prisoner endeavours to prove his being in a different place from that where the Crime for which he stands indicted, was, or is supposed to be committed.

(2) A Woman swore the law Ireland in London, about the middle of August. Burnet, p. 443. No. 78. Vol. II.

1678-9. was brought some time after, till he should be called to his examination. As soon as Bedloe, who was purposely planted in the same room, had cast his eyes upon him, he cried out, "This is one of the rogues that I saw with a dark lantern about the body of Sir Edmundbury Godfrey; but he was then in a Perruwig."

If any care had been taken to prove that Bedloe had asked which was Prance, and that he purposely waited for him in the Eating-house, where he knew he was to be brought, there would be no need of other proof, and the case would be decided. But this fact entirely rests upon the authority of the Historian who relates it (1).

Prance being carried to the Committee of Lords, Bedloe directly charged him with the murder of Godfrey, and Wren with being out of the house while the body was missing. Prance denied all with imprecations upon himself. But as the bare denial of a prisoner ought not to carry it against the testimony of two witnesses, the Lords thought fit to send him to Newgate, where he was put in the Condemned Hole, loaded with heavy irons, and, says my Author, left all night to consider what further answers to make, and whether he would venture his Soul or his Body.

Herein manifestly appears the prejudice of the Historian, who cannot have known, that the intention of the Lords was to leave Prance to consider, whether he would venture his Soul or his Body. He could say this but by virtue of his System, which supposes, that the Committee was resolved at any rate, to make Prance an evidence to the murder of Godfrey.

But here is another fact still more important, advanced with the same assurance without any authority.

The next morning early, a man entered the Condemned Hole, where Prance was; and laying down a paper upon a form just by him, retired; soon after came in another with a candle, who set it down and left him. By that light he read the paper, wherein he found brief hints to what he was to swear when he should be called to his second examination, with a menace of being hanged if he did not confess what was expected of him. Prance, says the Author, presently imagined this to be a contrivance of the Lord Shaftsbury.

A fact of this nature, (which passed in a dungeon where there is but one man, and where two others, at several times, only go in and out, without saying a word, one to bring a paper, the other a candle) can only be known by Prance's own confession. Now it is certain, Prance never owned any such thing; if he had, it would assuredly have been said, how and upon what occasion. But if this be so, how it can it be said that Prance imagined this to be a contrivance of the Earl of Shaftsbury? Is it a thing so common, to know what passes in a Man's private thoughts, that it is not worth the while to say how this knowledge was attained?

I proceed to other facts which are not contested. Prance after he had continued in prison all night, and part of the next day, told Captain Richardson, Master of Newgate, that he had matters of great moment to communicate to the Earl of Shaftsbury Chairman of the Committee. He was, according to his request, carried the same night to the Earl, who, in presence of three other persons, examined him five or six hours. It is pretended that the Earl abused and menaced him, telling him, That there were great ones concerned, and he must discover them too; for the little ones should not serve his turn, bidding him, not spare the King himself. It does not however appear that these menaces made much impression upon Prance, since his depositions reached only persons of low condition. However, he discovered part of what he said he knew, with a promise of a more ample confession if he might have his pardon. He signed his deposition, and was returned to prison. Upon this the Lords obtained for him from his Majesty a full and general pardon. Then a Committee of the Lords was sent to Newgate to acquaint him with it, and to examine him. The Commons likewise ordered him to be examined by a Committee of secrecy. These two examinations being made with great strictness, Prance was carried the next day to Whitehall, to be examined before the King and Council.

In this examination he accused five persons, as actually present at the murder; namely Girald and Kelley, two Irish Priests; Robert Green, Cushion-Man to the Queen's Chapel; Laurence Hill Servant to Dr. Godden Treasurer of the Chapel; and Henry Berry Porter of Somerset-House. Being asked, Why he gave so different a relation to the Committee of Lords from what he now so freely confessed? He answered, That he was not then sure of his pardon. Being further asked, Why he came not in upon the proclamation and reward thereof? He said, He was afraid to trust it.

As he had been very particular concerning the circumstances of the time, place, and manner of the murder, the King to be assured of the truth, appointed the Duke of Monmouth, the Earl of Offory, and the Vice-chamberlain, to go with Prance to Somerset-House, and make him show them the places where the things were asked. The Author so often mentioned, adds what deserves to be remembered. Prance, says he, was very punctual in naming and showing some of the rooms, but so uncertain and dubious in some particulars, especially about the chief room, that when the Duke of Monmouth privately asked the Earl of Offory, what he thought on it? The Earl answered, It was all a cheat (2). I purposely take notice of this particular, because it is directly contrary to the report made to the Council, as will presently appear.

In the afternoon, Prance, in the presence of the Council, was confronted with Green, Berry, and Hill, who denied every syllable of the charge, and Prance stood as stoutly to every point of the accusation. After which he was sent back to Newgate for four or five days.

The same Authors say here, that his irons were sometimes off and sometimes on, according as he was in a discovering temper. That is to say, the jailor by the secret orders of the Committee, treated him well or ill, as he was disposed to retract or adhere to his deposition. Another particular is likewise added, that he was often visited by Members of both Houses, who sometimes severely threatened him when his evidence did not agree with Bedloe's, and particularly because he would not own the Perruwig which Bedloe had first mentioned. But these particulars tending to show that Prance was forced to depose what he knew not, are supported by no Author, no Evidence, no Authority. There are no other vouchers but the Historians who report these particulars, without vouchsafing to inform their Readers from whence they received them.

After Prance had remained four or five days in Newgate, he was once more carried to be examined before the King in Council. But he made it his request that he might first wait upon the King himself. Upon this Richardson had orders to carry him to Mr. Chiffinch's lodgings, where the King came. The King taking Prance into a room by himself, after some time, opened the door, and bad Chiffinch and Richardson take notice of what Prance said; who being called to speak out plainly, he declared, That the men he had sworn against were all innocent, and that all he had sworn against them was false, which he affirmed, says before the King, Echard, Ill. p. 507. Upon which the King asked him, Upon your salvation is it so? He replied, Upon my salvation the whole accusation is false. He was then carried before the Council, where he declared to the same effect, and was asked, What Inducement he had to his former Story—who put him upon it? He said, *No body prompted him; he only knew the men he swore against; he never saw Bedloe before he was taken up; he knew nothing of the Plot nor of the murder;—and could not rest for the story he had told. But Wren owed him money, and threatened him because he dunned him for it, and so haired him into it.* He was then remanded to prison.

After so serious an affirmation, no man of sense can imagine, that Catholics, or Courtiers had gained Prance to retract his first deposition. For this would be only to alledge a bare suspicion without proof. But to have it believed, that the Committee, and several members of both Houses, had threatened Prance in case his deposition agreed not with Bedloe's, there is no need of proof, and the bare relation of a Historian who writ above thirty years after, is more than sufficient for that.

Unhappily Prance retracted once more. But this signifies nothing, because he denied what he had lately said before the King and Council, by reason of the excessive torments he was made to suffer, till he had promised to depose whatever was desired. Let us hear what a famous Historian (3) says on this occasion (4).

"Prance,

(1) Our Author means Echard. Burnet says, Prance being taken up on Wren's Information, was carried to Whitehall. Bedloe was likewise pressed by him, knowing any thing concerning him: And at first sight, he charged somebody to be present on him. But he was one of those, whom he saw at Godfrey's body, p. 445.

(2) In an account of the Plot printed in 1680, it is said, That Prance gave such an exact account of the very spot upon which the murder was committed, where he himself, where Berry stood; as also the door, stairs, dark entry, &c. mentioned in his Narrative, that his Majesty's Councilmen were so well satisfied with the truth of his relation and confession, p. 68.

Yet he went off from this story, and denied every thing. Dr. Lloyd was upon this sent to talk with him. Archbishop was also sent to him, and he was carried back to Prison. p. 2.

"Prance, excepting just after his return, stood firm and immovable in his denial, against all terrors and temptations for about twelve days, from the 29th of December to the 11th of this present January. During which space of time, his usage was barbarous, and more like the Romish Inquisition, than the methods of a free nation. For nine days at least his case was deplorable; and what with the deadly cold and nastiness of the place, the distress of his condition, the agony of his thoughts, under the horror of bringing new guilt upon his conscience, and the galling weight of his Irons, he lay in such torments both of body and mind, that he spent his hours in roaring and groaning, frequently and pitifully crying out, Not guilty, not guilty! No murder, no murder! He used the same outcries, or clamours, at least, to that effect, so often, that the imposers had no way to cover the scandal, and the inhumanity of their treatment, but either by imputing the anguish of a wounded conscience to the ravings of a disordered brain; or by converting the marks of a true repentance into the story of a counterfeit madness. But when things were at the worst, Prance was now and then, as the good humour prevailed, eased of his Irons, comforted with good words and promises, and no artifice omitted to bring him to a proper understanding. The Keepers were then under the sole direction of a certain ambulatory Committee, when and what degree to squeeze, to pinch, to ease, to shackle, to comfort, or to torment their prisoners; and most things were done according to the particular orders of that cabal. It would be too tedious to recite all the sufferings of this unfortunate man, who being unable to hold out as Corral had done, and finding his life in the same danger with those he had accused, he at length submitted to the temptation, and upon a new assurance of pardon, he promised to stand by his former evidence. Immediately upon this, on the 11th of January, his Irons were knocked off, and he was removed from hard boards, and a dismal cold room, to a fine lodging and a curious bed, with variety of the best meats and drinks. Here having pen, ink and paper, and the assistance of his friend one Mr. Boyle, he finished his story, and prepared for being a complete evidence against Green, Berry and Hill, who were shortly after to come upon their trials."

As the author of this passage is not content with insinuating, that Prance was compelled by torments to support his second deposition, but openly undertakes to prove it by facts which are entirely decisive, it is absolutely necessary for the Reader's instruction to make some remarks on this subject.

1. When in a controverted matter, a Historian reports facts to which he was not an eye-witness, and which however are capable of deciding for or against, the Reader has a right to expect from him some testimony, or some author; in a word, to be informed, how he came to the knowledge of such facts. But here, we see neither testimony nor author, in the text, or margin.

2. It appears from this very relation, that all the ill usage of Prance, consisted in keeping him nine days in Irons. If this is like a Romish inquisition, it may be affirmed, England has a constant inquisition, since prisoners committed for murder, or other great crimes are never treated otherwise. Besides, it will be seen hereafter, that Prance denied his ever receiving any ill usage in prison, or his wanting any thing. As to the torments of his mind, and his roarings and groanings, supposing them true, only Prance himself could know the motives, and it must be surprising to see an author talk of what passed in Prance's mind, as if he had been his confidant.

3. He ought to have explained what was this Ambulatory Committee, from whom the Keepers received directions; for it is well known, that during the prorogation of the Parliament (and all this passed at the time of the prorogation) the Keeper of Newgate could obey no orders but those of the King, or at least of the Courts of Justice.

4. Lastly, in proof of a fact so remarkable and decisive, we have only the bare asseveration of the author, whose exaggeration is kept up with expressions the strongest and most capable to give the Readers terrible ideas of the torments endured by Prance, which, however, amount to a nine days imprisonment in Irons. Besides, the author positively says, that Prance was gained without telling us by whom, or how, or giving the least warrant for what he advances. I do not say that all this is false, for I know nothing of it. But as it is not forbid to rely on the faithfulness of the author, or of those from whom he has received his informations; so neither is it forbid to doubt of it, and to believe that he might be prejudiced by Party-factions, which are implicitly swallowed or rejected, according as they are advantageous or prejudicial to the side espoused by those who hear them.

Bodley had given but a very imperfect information of the murder of Godfrey. He said indeed, it was committed in Somerst-House, and that he had seen the dead body. But as to the other circumstances, he only spoke of them as received from persons who had absented themselves; whereas Prance delivered in writing a more regular and full account, which contained precisely his deposition before the King in Council, and was to this effect:

"Gerald, Kelly, Green, Berry, Hill and Prance, with the approbation of some others, after several consultations (1), had resolved to murder Sir Edmundbury Godfrey, as being a bitter persecutor of the Catholics, an active discoverer of their designs, and a particular enemy to the Queen's servants. Thus determined, on Saturday the 12th of October, Hill went to Sir Edmundbury Godfrey's house in the morning, and talked with him in private (2). Then taking his leave, he went to Gerald, and Green, and with them staid hard by, waiting for the Gentleman's coming out, which he did about ten or eleven, all alone as usually. They dogged him to several places, till about six or seven in the evening, when Green went to Prance's house, and told him, They had set him near St. Clements; and that Prance must make all haste to the Water-Gate, at Somerst-House, where he should find Kelly and Berry, which he did; and they three waited there till about nine o'clock: When of a sudden Hill came running and said, He was coming, and they must pretend a quarrel, and he would fetch him in. While Kelly and Berry were in a seeming scuffle, Hill, at the gate, stopped Sir Edmundbury Godfrey, and entreated him for God's sake to come in, for two men were a quarrelling, and he was afraid there would be bloodshed. The Gentleman being a Magistrate, did at last consent, and Hill entered the gate first, to shew him the persons; and after them followed Gerald and Green; while Prance watched the water-gate, and Berry was to secure the passage by the chapel. But first, he and Kelly, the pretended combatants, stood about the end of the rail by the Queen's stables; and as Sir Edmundbury went down towards them, Green suddenly threw a twisted handkerchief about his neck, and immediately all four pulled him down and strangled him, so as he could make no noise; after which they threw him behind the rail, and gave him some violent punches on the breast with their knees, and Green with all his force rung his neck all most round. Prance and Berry being come to them, when he was quite dead, they all helped to carry the body into Dr. Godden's lodgings, where Hill lived, and where they brought him up five or six steps, into a little room on the right-hand, and there left him that night, and Sunday all day and night. On Monday night, Hill and some others removed him into a room in the upper Court, where Prance was shewn the body by the light of a dark-lantern, and where Bodley swore he saw Prance. On Tuesday night, they carried him to another room in the long entry, over-against Dr. Godden's lodgings; and on Wednesday night they removed it to the little room where it was first laid. Having kept the body above four days and nights, Gerald and Kelly advised to have it carried into the fields, and leave him run through with his own sword, that he might be supposed to have murdered himself; and therefore his money, rings, &c. were all to be left with him. This being agreed, they resolved to carry him out that night; and accordingly Hill procured a Sedan, or Chair, into which they put the body about twelve a clock. Berry the Porter, having invited the centinels into his house, opened the gate, and Prance and Gerald carried out the Sedan (3). Thus, sometimes they two, and sometimes Kelly and Green, carried it up towards Soho-fields, hard by the Greecian Church; and there Hill attending with a horse, they set the body up before him, and left the Sedan in some unfinished buildings in that place; whereupon Gerald said, I wish we had a hundred such rogues as secure as this. Then Prance being a house keeper, returned home; and the other four went on, one leading

Dr. Lloyd told me, that he was almost dead through the disorder of his mind, and with cold in his body. But as it is that Dr. Lloyd had made a fire, and caused him to be put in a bed, and began to discover the matter with him, he returned to his confession; which he did in such a manner, that Dr. Lloyd said to me, it was not possible for him to doubt of his sincerity in it, p. 445.

(2) He went to see whether Godfrey was gone out, and spoke to his maid; who, upon Hill's being taken, went to Newgate, and in the crowd of Prisoners did this guided him, saying, He was the person that asked for her master that morning. Ibid — They had watched Sir Edmundbury for several weeks, before they could find an opportunity of putting their villainous design in execution. MSS

1678-9. "the horse, Hill riding and holding the body (1), and the other two walking by. They carried him to a place called Primrose-hill, about two miles out of town, where they left him in a ditch, with his own sword run through his body by Girald himself, in the exact posture of one that had murdered himself."

This deposition, which was immediately published, met with an entire belief from the people. But afterwards, when the popish party prevailed, several authors endeavoured to find many mistakes and inconsistencies in it, and even maintained, that it was not penned by Prance, but by some abler hand. As at first it was dangerous to say, that Prance was a false witness, it was afterwards no less dangerous to maintain, he had spoke the truth. Hence some adhere to this deposition, and others to the writings afterwards published against it, to demonstrate its fallshood.

While these things were transacted, the King was by no means at ease. The Plot, (of which he was suspected to be the Author, at least in what concerned the Government and Religion) and the impeachment against the Earl of Danby, which entirely reflected upon him, could not but greatly perplex him. To divert a little these suspicions, he published, the beginning of January, several proclamations against the Papists, who, immediately after the prorogation of the Parliament, were returned to London and Westminster. By another proclamation, he recalled all his subjects from the foreign Seminaries; but these were remedies little capable of curing the people's suspicions and fears.

About this time, was discovered a College of Jesuits at Louwer-Come in Hersfordshire. Moreover, a fresh witness appeared, one Stephen Dugdale, who pretended to make new discoveries in the Plot, and accused five Jesuits, and one Priest (2). This obliged the King to publish a new proclamation against Evers, Gawen, Vasafr alias Gifford, Levison, Jesuits, and Broadstreet a Priest, with a promise of a hundred pounds to any that should apprehend Evers, and fifty pounds for each of the rest (3).

Mean while, as the time for the meeting of the Parliament approached, the King perceiving, that in the present disposition of the Commons, he should receive no advantage from them, but rather new mortifications, on the 24th of January dissolved this Parliament by proclamation (4), promising withal, to issue out writs for the calling of a new Parliament the 6th of March following. Thus ended the Long Parliament, which had continued almost eighteen years, and had been for twelve years so favorable to the King. Never Parliament had been so liberal to any King, or carried the Prerogative higher. If Charles II. had not pursued methods so contrary to the interests of the Kingdom, he would never have lost the affection of this Parliament, which studied only to please him, and give him the most effectual proofs of their zeal. But when, in process of time they discovered, that the King had ill designs against the Government, and the established Religion, which he had sufficiently shown by his two wars against Holland, and his intimate union with France, they began to consider him as an enemy to the State, whose designs and measures were to be broken. The Letters, produced by Mr. Montague in the Parliament, fully convinced the most incredulous, that the King was a Pensioner of France, and sacrificed the interest of England to that Crown. It is therefore no wonder, that the Parliament credited the discovery of a Plot, which was so natural a consequence of the King's designs, now entirely believed. Indeed, the first article of this Plot, concerning the killing of the King, might be doubtful and uncertain; wherefore the Parliament willingly left it to the decision of the Courts of Justice. But the two last, relating to the rendering the King absolute, and subverting the established Religion, needed no other proofs than those the King had given. Besides, the Duke of York being a professed Papist, and having a great influence in the King's counsels, it was not difficult to conceive, that being such a zealot for his Religion, he would lose no occasion of promoting it: and this his Secretary's letters plainly demonstrated. Indeed, this Parliament was composed chiefly of rigid Episcopalians, who perhaps cannot be vindicated in their persecution of the Presbyterians. But however, they were not willing to sacrifice the Protestant Religion, and the liberties of the Nation, to their passion against Presbyterianism. From hence flowed the quarrels between the King and the Parliament, the mortifications so frequently given him, and his dissolution of it at last, though he had in it so many creatures, purchased either with ready money or pensions. At first, this trade was secretly carried on, but after Clifford's advancement to the Treasury, it was practised so openly, that every man's name and price were publicly known. Notwithstanding all this, when once the conduct of the King and Court was considered, it was not possible for the King to obtain a majority in the House of Commons, because those who were ready to sacrifice the nation's money to the King, would not sacrifice to him their Liberties and Religion. Another cause also stopped the King in his career, namely, that as soon as the people were dissatisfied with the Court, vacancies in the Parliament were filled with men of quite contrary principles to the King and Duke of York, so that in time, the Parliament became very different from what it was at the beginning. It is not therefore strange, that the King should desire to be rid of a Parliament, from which he could expect no farther benefit. But he flattered himself in vain, with having another more favorable, as will hereafter appear.

Upon the 25th of January, the King issued out writs for the new elections, which put the whole nation into a ferment. It happened to the King, on this occasion, as it had happened to his Father. The people being discontented with the Court, and full of suspicions and fears, affected to choose Representatives the most averse to Popery and arbitrary Government. And as the High-Church-men had been for several years a little too strongly attached to the King; and had, in the last Parliament, passed Acts to raise the royal power higher than ever, the people in general were not for trusting their interests in such hands. On the other side, the Presbyterians, though long oppressed, were still numerous in the Corporations, so that by the superiority of their votes, they commonly carried the elections in favour of their own party, or at least of men, who had only outwardly conformed to the Church of England. In a word, when the returns were made, it was found, that most of the Representatives were men very opposite to the principles and designs of the Court. The King, to prevent these impressions, affected an extraordinary severity against the Papists, and by proclamation, on complaint of the neglects of the prosecution of Recusants, ordered the Chancellor to put out of commission, all Justices of Peace, who were remiss in their duty. But this was too frequent an artifice, to be capable to persuade the people, that the King was truly zealous for the Protestant Religion.

While all were engaged in the new elections, three of the five, accused of Godfrey's murder, namely, Greene, Berry, and Hill, were tried at the King's Bench bar, before the Lord Chief-Justice Scroggs, the 10th of February.

Oates deposed, That he had heard Godfrey say, a little before his death, That he went in fear of his life by the popish party, and had been dogged several days.

One Robinson testified, That he heard him say, That he believed he should be the first martyr.

Prance's evidence was the same with what he had before deposed. The prisoners objected to him, that he had recanted, and denied all before the King and Council. The Court made for him the answer which he had before given to the Council, That all that was nothing but an unseasonable fear, and a want of a full assurance of his pardon (5). Some represent this as a great partiality in the Judge. But it must be observed, that Judges sit upon the trial of criminals, not to condemn or acquit: the Jury decide the case, and find the prisoners guilty or not guilty. When therefore any material difficulty offers, it is the office of the Judge to direct the Jury, and show them what they are, and what they are not to mind, with the reasons of their

(2) Barnet gives the following account of this Dugdale and his evidence. He had been the Lord Essex's Bail, and was a man of Sense and Temper. He behaved himself decently, and had somewhat in his air and deportment that disposed people to believe him: So that the King himself began to think there was somewhat in the Plot, though he had little regard to Oates or Bedloe. He made a discovery of a correspondence that Evers held with the Jesuits in London, who had writ to Evers of the design of killing the King, and desired him to find out proper men for executing it. Three other Jesuits pressed Dugdale to undertake it, promising he should be canonized for it, and the Lord Stafford offered him five hundred pounds, if he would set about it. Dugdale's evidence was confirmed by one circumstance. He had talked in the Country of a Justice of Peace in Westminster that was killed, on the Tuesday after Godfrey was killed, so that the news of this must have been writ from London on the Saturday night's Post. He did not think it a secret, so talked of it as news in an Ale-house. The two persons, he said he spoke to, remembered nothing of it, but several others swore they had heard it. He said moreover, that the Duke had sent to Coleman when in Neuport, to persuade him to discover nothing, and desired to know whether he had ever discovered their designs to any other person; and that Coleman sent answer, that he had spoke of them to Godfrey, but to no other man, upon which the Duke gave order to kill him, p. 444.

(3) Gawen was soon after taken into custody, but the rest absconded. Essex.

(4) Some think, this Parliament was dissolved, on purpose to protect the popish Lords in the Tower, and divert, if possible, the noise of the popish Plot: Or else to cover the Duke of York from the resentment of the Commons, and the general indignation of the People. Kennet, p. 356.

(5) To this Richardson, Keeper of Neuport, answered, "That Prance had told him, it was fear that made him recant; and he [Prance] gave a full and plain story, that it was only out of an apprehension that his life was not secure; that his trade would be lost among the Roman Catholics; and in case he had his pardon, and were freed, he should have been in danger of being murdered by them." He said himself afterwards, That it was for fear of losing his employment from the Queen, and the Catholics, which was the most of his business, and because he had not his pardon. State-Trials, Tom. 2. p. 765, 766.

1678-9. opinion. So I doubt, that on this occasion the Court did not exceed the bounds of their duty, though I will affirm nothing.

Hill's wife asked Prance, Whether he had not been tortured in Newgate, since several had heard him cry out in that place? He answered, That he had not—That Captain Richardson had used him as civilly as any man in England; and that all the time he was there, he wanted for nothing. This answer, as we see, is very contradictory to the aggravated recital of his torments, though even in that recital, nothing is said which tends to show, that he was put to the torture. However, the author of the recital, better informed than Prance himself, scruples not to say, That the poor man, to support the credit of his evidence, was forced to disown all his barbarous usage.

Bedloe had already deposed before the Lords, That le Phaire, Walsh, Pritchard, Keins, &c. had wheedled Sir Edmundbury Godfrey into Somerst-House Court, under pretence of taking some plotters; and after a turn or two, and the pretence of sending for a Constable, they shoved him into a room, presented a pistol to him, threatening to kill him, if he made any noise, but would do him no hurt, if he would send for his examinations; which he refusing to do, they filled him between two pillows, and after that, upon finding some life in him, they strangled him with a long cravat.

Some have remarked, that this first evidence of Bedloe, was directly contrary to Prance's. Others have observed, that Bedloe never said that he was present at the murder, but only deposed what he heard from others; consequently, that there was no real contradiction between the two witnesses.

In the present trial Bedloe deposed, "That about a fortnight before the murder, le Phaire, Pritchard, Keins, and some other Romish Priests, all unknown to Prance, discoursed Bedloe about killing a certain Gentleman, not named; and then set him to insinuate himself into Sir Edmundbury Godfrey's acquaintance, which he did under several pretences. That on the very day of the murder, le Phaire told him, There was a Gentleman to be put out of the way that night, and would have him to assist, and that there would be four thousand pounds reward from the Lord Bellasis, &c. and therefore desired him to meet in the Cloyster at Somerst-house that evening, for that abouts it was to be done; which he promised to do, but wilfully failed them, because he would not have his hands in blood. On the Monday after, le Phaire meeting him, charged him with breach of promise, and appointed him to come to Somerst-house at nine that night, where he told the witness, That he had done ill, that he did not help in the business; but if he would help to carry him off, he should still have half the reward; and told him he was actually murdered. The witness asked, if he might see him; upon which le Phaire led him through a dark entry, into a room where was several people, and Prance amongst them, and only by the light of a dark lantern he saw the face of the murdered person, and knew him to be Sir Edmundbury Godfrey. The witness advised to tie weights about him, and throw him into the Thames; but they did not approve of that, but said, they would put it upon himself, and carry him out in a chair, by the help of the Porter Berry, at twelve that night. The witness promised, upon the Sacrament, which he had taken the Thursday before, to come again and help them; but being got from them, his conscience would not permit him to go any farther, though he had been promised two thousand pounds for his labour, but he rather chose to discover the villany to the King and Council, and accept of a quarter of the sum in an honest way."

What appears most strange in this deposition, is not its contrariety to the first, in which he only spoke by hearsay; but that Bedloe did not relate these circumstances to the Lords, having only said, that he had seen Godfrey's body in Somerst-house, and Prance in the same room.

The Constable that viewed the body in the ditch, gave an account, "That the sword was sticking through him, but no blood appeared upon the ground, and he found gold and silver in his pockets." Two Surgeons swore, "That they verily believed the sword was run through him after he was dead and cold; but that he died by reason of the suffocation, and breaking of his neck, and bruises on his breast."

Sir Robert Southwell deposed, "That Prance having related the matter to the Council; and being sent with the Duke of Monmouth and the Earl of Offory to shew the place he mentioned, did readily go to them all, and they appeared all to be such as he had described them; only as to the room in the upper Court, where the body was laid one night, having never been there but once, he said he could not positively assign it, but pointing to some rooms, and said, he was sure it was thereabouts." As to the prisoners defence, Hill brought several witnesses to prove, "That he was never out of his lodgings after eight a-clock at night, during the whole time of this transaction."

Some have pretended, that these depositions were not regarded, because the witnesses were few. But no such thing is said in the printed trial, and it is difficult to know the thoughts of the Jury, who were the sole Judges of these evidences.

Besides, Hill showed, "That when he heard of Prance's being taken up for the murder, he had full leisure to make his escape, which he never endeavouring, was a great presumption of his innocence." It is to be presumed, the Jury took but little notice of this proof.

Green proved by two witnesses, James Warrior and his wife, "That he was at their House in the Strand from between seven and eight, till after ten, on that very night and time that Sir Edmundbury Godfrey was said to be murdered in Somerst-house." But unhappily, Warrior willing to corroborate his evidence, added, "That Green's being apprehended a month after the murder of Godfrey, recalled to his mind, that the said Green had been with him on the evening the 12th of October, from eight to ten in the evening." But, besides that, Green was not arrested till the 24th of December, that is to say, two months and twelve days after Godfrey's murder, he was not taken up for this murder, but for refusing the oath, which could not cause Warrior to remember, that Green had been with him the day Godfrey was murdered. Green added, "That when Prance was taken up, he flewed such a detestation of the fact, that he said, Rather than he should escape, if he were guilty, he would be the executioner himself." In all likelihood, this proof appeared not very material to the Jury. In behalf of Berry the Porter, the soldiers that were placed centinel at the gate, testified, "That no Sedan went out of the gate that night that the body was said to be carried off, though one did come in, and that they could not be mistaken in so plain a matter." And Berry's maid declared, "That her master was in bed by twelve a clock that night, and never stirred out, which made it impossible for him to be upon the whole expedition."

They all endeavoured likewise to invalidate Prance's evidence, but the Court observed, "That it was impossible that Mr. Prance, a man of that mean capacity, should invent a story with so many conflicting circumstances, if there was no truth in the bottom of it." But adds the Historian whom I have often quoted, "others observed, that the story was invented by some body else of a greater capacity." This information is supported only upon his system. But besides, had the penner of this Narrative been so able as is supposed, it would not have been difficult to give it a perfect agreement with Bedloe's first deposition, whereas it was different in many respects. For when a man is only to invent, and has false witnesses ready to support the invention, he need not be much puzzled about the facts.

In conclusion, the Jury brought them in all guilty of the murder. Whereupon, the Lord Chief Justice Sergeant said, "They had found the same verdict that he would have found, if he had been one with them."

They all three insisted upon their innocence to the last moment of their lives. Berry owned, "That he was a Protestant in his heart, but had for some time dissimulated his Religion for his private advantage."

Hill, to persuade the Ordinary of Newgate of his innocence, gave him this notable proof of it; "That he had wronged one in a twelve-penny matter, which had so troubled his conscience, that he had made restitution since his condemnation, though he was in extreme want of present necessities." And therefore he thus argued with him, "If I have taken shame upon my self, in confessing my crime in the case of a trifle; can you think I would deny the murder to maintain my reputation?" Green and Hill were executed the 21st of February; but Berry was reprieved till the 28th of May.

The time for the meeting of the Parliament drawing near, the King, after examining the elections, foresaw a storm gathering against the Duke of York. Wherefore, to prevent it, and persuade the new Parliament that his counsels were not influenced by his Brother, he resolved to send him away (1), and for that purpose, the 28th of February, writ him the following letter:

"I have already given you my resolves at large, why I think it fit that you should absent your self for some time beyond the seas: As I am truly sorry for the occasion, so may you be sure, I shall never desire it longer than it will be absolutely necessary for your good, and my ser-

The Duke immediately obeyed, and the 3d of March departed for Holland, with his Dukes, and the Princess Anne his Daughter, from whence he went and resided at Brussels.

Mean time, the King fearing that the new Parliament would impeach the Earl of Danby, and that the Earl, in prevention of his own danger, would be obliged to reveal secrets, which he wished to be concealed, granted him, under the Great Seal, as full and compleat a pardon as could be drawn.

The new Parliament meeting the 6th of March, the King made a Speech, tending to show how well affected he was to the laws of the land, and the Protestant Religion.
He spoke of his care in punishing, as well those concerned in the plot, as the murderers of Sir Edmundbury Godfrey, and forgot not to mention the removal of the Duke of York. Lastly, he demanded money for disbanding the army, for paying the fleet. The Chancellor enlarged upon all these points with great exaggerations, according to his custom.

The Parliament began with a warm dispute between the King and the Commons, about the choice of a Speaker.
The Commons having chosen Mr. Edward Seymour (1), the King, who knew, Seymour was a particular enemy of the Earl of Danby, refused his approbation, and ordered the Commons to proceed to a new choice. The House was extremely displeased with this refusal, alledging, That it was never known that a person should be excepted against, and no reason at all given, and that the thing itself of presenting a Speaker to the King, was but a bare compliment.
The King, on his side, insisted on the approbation or refusal of a Speaker when presented to him, as a branch of his Prerogative (2). During a six days dispute, the Commons made several representations to the King, to which he gave very short answers. At last, as the Commons would not desist from what they thought their right, the King went to the Parliament, and prorogued it from the 11th to the 15th; that is, for one day's interval between the two sessions. The Parliament meeting the 15th, the King ordered the Commons to proceed to the choice of a Speaker. Then, to avoid a revival of the dispute, they chose Mr. William Gregory Serjeant at Law, who was approved by the King (3).

The Commons began with appointing a Committee to examine controverted elections, threecore petitions having been already presented.

This affair being put into a way of determination, the Commons appeared resolved to pursue the matters which the late Parliament had left undecided. For this purpose, the 20th of March, they appointed a secret Committee, to take informations, prepare evidence, and draw up articles against the Lords that were impeached, and to take such further informations as should be given, relating to the plot against his Majesty and the Government, and the murder of Sir Edmundbury Godfrey. At the same time, they desired the Lords, by an express message, to remember the impeachment of High-treason exhibited against Thomas Earl of Danby, in the names of the Commons of England, and to commit him to safe custody. They resolved also, that it should be referred to the Committee of Secrecy, to draw up further articles against him. The Earl of Danby was greatly embarrassed; for he could not make his defence, without producing the letters writ by his Majesty's particular order, and other papers which the King was willing to conceal. Wherefore he resolved to adhere to the benefit of his pardon.

The next day, the 21st of March, Dr. Tonge, Oates, Bedloe, and a Scotchman, one Edmund Everard, a new discoverer, were called before the Commons, to give in their informations concerning the plot. Bedloe having delivered in his information, the House resolved, "That an hum"ble address be made to his Majesty, that the five hundred "pounds promised by his Proclamation for the discovery of "the murder of Sir Edmundbury Godfrey, may be paid to "Mr. Bedloe, and that he would further be pleased to or"der, that the twenty pounds reward for the discovery "of every Priest, may be effectually paid to the disco"verers."

By another address they desired, "That the care of "Mr. Bedloe's safety might be recommended to the Duke "of Monmouth." The King answered, "That he would "take immediate care for the payment of the five hun"dred pounds, and the twenty pounds they desired: That "he had hitherto taken all the care he could of Mr. Bed-
"loe: That he knew how considerable his evidence was:
"That he would fee hereafter, that he should want for no"thing; but that he could not be answerable for him when "he went abroad."

Upon the whole, the Commons came to a vote something like that in the last Parliament, namely, "That the House
"doth declare, That they are fully satisfied that there now "is, and for divers years last past hath been, a horrid and "treasonable Plot and Conspiracy, contrived and carried "on by those of the popish Religion, for the murdering
"his Majesty's sacred person, and for subverting the Pro"testant Religion, and the ancient and well-established Go"vernment of this Kingdom." The Lords concurred to this vote without hesitation, as also to an address to be presented jointly by both Houses to the King, to pray him to appoint a solemn day of humiliation and fasting throughout the whole Kingdom. The King granted their request, and the 11th of April was appointed to be kept as a publick fast day.

The 22d of March, the Commons ordered a Bill to be brought in, to secure the King and Kingdom against the danger and growth of Popery.

The same day the King going to the Parliament, spoke to both Houses in favour of the Earl of Danby. But the Commons, unmoved with this Speech, were no sooner returned to their House, than they sent a message to the Lords, to demand that the Earl might be forthwith committed to safe custody. The Lords seeing the passion of the Commons, offered them in a conference, the draught of a Bill, by which the Earl of Danby should be for ever incapable of coming to his Majesty's presence, and of all offices and employments, and of receiving any gifts or grants from the Crown, and of sitting in the House of Peers. But the Commons were not satisfied with such a Bill, probably, for two reasons. The first was, that the Earl of Danby had implacable enemies among the leading Commons. The second, that purposing to discover the King's secrets, by a strict examination of the Earl of Danby's affairs, they saw that this Bill was only an artifice, to conceal what they wished to know and divulge.

Mean time, the Commons hearing that the King had signed a pardon for the Earl of Danby, appointed a Committee to repair to the Chancellor, and inquire how this pardon was sealed, and at whose suit. The Chancellor answered, "That it was done very privately, the King
"having ordered him to bring the Seal into his closet, and "lay it upon the table; that his Majesty commanded the "Seal to be taken out of the bag, and ordered the person
"who usually carried the purse, to affix it to the pardon."
The Chancellor added in his justification, "That at the "very time of affixing the Seal to the parchment, he did "not look upon himself to have the custody of the Seal:
"That the pardon was passed with the utmost privacy, at
"the desire of the Earl, who gave this reason for it, That he did not intend to make use of it, but to stand upon his innocence, except false witnesses should be produced against him; and then he would make use of it at the last extremity: That notwithstanding this reason, he advised the Earl to let the pardon pass in the regular course; but after consulting with the King, his Majesty declared, He was resolved to let it pass with all privacy." (4)

The House, upon hearing this report, were inflamed against the Earl, and one of the members (5), naming the Earl of Danby, proceeded thus:

(1) Who was one of the Representatives for the County of Devon, and Treasurer of the Navy. Kennet, p. 360.

(2) Without giving any reason to the persons chusing, or the person chosen. Edward, Tem. 3. p. 523.

(3) He was recommended by William Lord Russell. Kennet, p. 360. Burnet adds, the point was settled, that the right of electing was in the House, and that the confirmation was a thing of course, p. 453.

(4) The King, in his Speech for the Earl, said, he had done nothing but by his order, and therefore he had pardoned him; and if there was any defect in his pardon, he would pass it over and over again, until it should be legal. Upon this a great debate was raised, some questioned whether the King's pardon, especially when passed in Bar to an impeachment, was good in Law: This would encourage ill Ministers, who would be always sure of a pardon. The King's said he did indeed secure our against all prosecution at his suit. But, as in case of murder an appeal lay, from which the King's pardon did not cover the person, since the King could no more pardon the injuries done his people, than he could forgive the debts that were owing to them; so from a parity of reason it was infered, that since the offences of Ministers of State were injuries done the publick, the King's pardon could not hinder a prosecution of Parliament, which seemed to be one of the chief securities, and most essential parts of our Constitution. When the Bill of Banishment, which passed in the House of Lords, was sent down to the Commons, Washington fell on it in a most furious manner, and inflamed the House, for that though it was offered that the Earl should be deposed of his Prerogative as well as banished, and that no pardon for the future should be pleaded in Bar to an impeachment; the Bill was thrown out by the Commons, and a Bill of Attainder brought in, as will be seen hereafter. Burnet, p. 453.

(5) Mr. Poultrey, afterwards one of the new Council.

— The person to whom we owe the dangers and fears of the French King against us: The person to whom we owe the threats and severe answers to those humble addresses we made the last session of Parliament: The person to whom we owe the ruin of this Nation, exhausting the King's revenue: The person to whom we owe the expence of two hundred thousand pounds a year, unaccounted for: The person to whom we owe the raising of a standing army, to be kept up by the receipt of six millions of Livres yearly, for three years, to enslave us, and our Religion: The person to whom we owe the late bone that was thrown in on the sitting of the last Parliament, to hinder the good issue that might have come by their proceedings; who is now laying down his Staff, and making up his accounts in the Treasury, as he pleases, to enrich himself out of the spoils of the People, and so depart."

I have often said, That the People in general were perfwaded, not only of the reality of the plot, at least with regard to the Government and Religion, but that even the King and the Duke of York were the true authors of it. This Speech plainly shows, it was at least the opinion of the Speaker, and when a member of the Commons advances such propositions, without a reprimand, one may be sure he speaks the general sense of the House. Besides, the removal of the Duke of York was a demonstration, that the King was not ignorant of his being suspected to submit too much to the counsels of his brother. It is therefore hard to conceive, why so many sensible men obstinately labour to show, there was no real Plot, because the article concerning the design of killing the King, may be doubtful. For, the truth of the two other branches, concerning the Government and Religion, flows from so many circumstances, that one must be wilfully blind not to see it. Perhaps the word Plot offends some persons, who cannot comprehend how a King can plot against his Subjects. But if this is all, there is a way to be soon agreed. Instead of saying there was a plot to subvert the Government, and the Protestant Religion, let it be said, there was a project or design on foot, headed by the King and the Duke of York, to render the King absolute, and introduce Popery. But this is precisely what is meant by the Plot. For the design of killing the King was only an appendix to the plot, supposing it real, and an effect of the furious zeal of some private persons, who thought to accomplish the Plot better by placing the Duke of York on the throne.

I shall not insert here the Earl of Shaftsbury's Speech in the House of Lords, because so much pains has been taken to represent him as the great enemy of the King, and the first mover of the whole party, that whatever came from him must be suspected. I shall produce, however, one passage of this Speech: "Popery, says he, and Slavery, like two sisters, go hand in hand; sometimes one goes first, sometimes the other; but whereforever the one enters, the other is always following close at hand. In England, Popery was to have brought in Slavery; in Scotland, Slavery went before, and Popery was to follow." Thus much is certain, that his observation on the Slavery of Scotland was exactly true, and that the Duke of Lauderdale, supported by the Court, exercised among the Scots a tyranny unknown to their fore-fathers. What therefore could the English imagine, when they saw a neighbouring Kingdom, invested with no less Privileges than England, governed in so absolute a manner, under the same King and the same Ministry? Could they expect that the same principles would not be followed in England, if it could be done with the same ease?

The same day, the Lords sent a message to acquaint the House of Commons, that the Earl of Danby had withdrawn, and could not be found. Whereupon the Commons ordered, "That a Bill be brought in to summon Thomas Earl of Danby, to render himself to justice by a day to be therein limited, or in default thereof, to attend him." The 3d of April, articles of impeachment against the five Lords in the Tower were drawn up by the Commons, and carried to the House of Lords, as well as the Bill to fix a day for the Earl of Danby to render himself to justice. The Lords having sent back this last Bill with some amendments, the Commons were dissatisfied, because the Lords were not of opinion, in case the Earl refused to surrender himself, to proceed against him by Bill of Attainder, but to content themselves with inflicting other penalties. The two Houses had several conferences upon this subject, in which the Commons continued immovable, without any diminution of their rigour against the Earl. At last the Lords passed the Bill, and appointed the 23d of April for the Earl's surrendering himself to trial. The Earl seeing that his absence could not hinder the Bill of Attainder from passing against him, resolved at last to surrender himself to the Usher of the Black-Rod, and the same day, he was sent to the Tower. The King then found himself involved in greater difficulties than he had ever struggled with before, as he saw, the Earl of Danby could not make his defence without divulging his secrets.

If the King would have altered his maxims and principles, he might have been easily freed from these troubles. He had only to break his union with France, dismiss those of his Ministers who were unacceptable to the Parliament, and act with sincerity for the interest of the Kingdom, and of the Protestant Religion, abandoning all the projects he had hitherto formed. But he could not resolve to make this sacrifice, both because he believed his honour concerned, and his design was only to gain time, and amuse the Parliament. It was with this view that, by the advice of Sir William Temple, he resolved to establish a new Council, into which were admitted some Lords most opposite to him, as the Earls of Shaftsbury and Essex. This Council consisted of thirty members (1), fifteen of whom were ever to be the present chief Officers of his Crown and Household. Ten were to be taken out of the nobility, and five out of the Commons. But he took care in this model of his Council, to have a majority of such as were devoted to him. The Earl of Shaftsbury was made President of this Council, though no man was more hated by the King. His aim was to periwade the publick and the Parliament, that he was resolved entirely to change his manner of governing, and be guided in all affairs whatsoever, by the advice of the new Council. But this was only to amuse the publick. For as it was not possible for the King to depart from his principles, concerning Religion or Government, so most of his new Councilors were not for sacrificing the royal authority to the will of the Parliament. The Earl of Shaftsbury would have been extremely pleased with being President of the Council, if his authority had been proportionable to his office. But he quickly perceived, he was there only for show, and to be subservient to the King's designs, whilst others had his confidence. There were chiefly four who had the direction of affairs committed to them, namely, the Earls of Sunderland and Essex, the Lord Halifax, and Sir William Temple. These digested and prepared what was to be proposed to the Council or the Parliament.

The King had no sooner made this alteration, than he came to the Parliament to acquaint them with it. But though the City of London, and the rest of the Kingdom resounded with joyful Acclamations, and were perfwaded that things were going to change for the better, the House of Commons received the news with great coldness. They had not sufficient confidence in the King, to believe he really intended to govern otherwise than he had hitherto done, but thought this was some new artifice, which would soon produce its effects. So, by this change the King gained not much ground in the House of Commons. I am sensible, the distrust of the Commons is ascribed to Shaftsbury's intrigues, and Sir William Temple even insinuates it in several places. But it is not easy to comprehend how a single man should have had credit enough in the Country-party, to direct them as he pleased, if that party had not otherwise known what Shaftsbury laboured to make them believe. For instance, this Earl insinuated that the nation could not be secured against the Duke of York, and that when he should once possess the Crown, all provisions against him would vanish. Was he in the wrong? And was there need of so great a credit to convince the Country-party of a thing they were but too well convinced of before? It is therefore a mere artifice solely to impute the animosity of the Commons to the Earl of Shaftsbury, as if it had no other foundation than his credit and intrigues, in order to remove thereby the just and real occasions of complaint against the King's Government. The measures pursued by the Court in the foregoing years, both against the established Government and Religion had been seen. What had the King done to cause them to be forgot? He had issued out proclamations against the Papists, but they were so ill executed, that they were not apt to inspire the Parliament with confidence. The King, under colour that he might be engaged in a war against France, had levied thirty thousand men, and at the same time was negotiating a yearly pension with that Crown of six millions of livres for their maintenance, as plainly appeared from the letters produced in Parliament. What had the King done to remove the fears occasioned by this army? He had applied to their maintenance the money granted by the Parliament for their disbanding, and if he had consented to their being dismissed, it was because he applied to another use the money received from France. In short, was it possible to forget the transactions of the Cabal, the King's indolence with regard to the interests of England and of 1679. all Europe, the frequent prorogations of Parliament at critical times, when vigorous resolutions were taking against France grown too powerful; his design, in conjunction with that Crown, of utterly destroying the Commonwealth of Holland; design so directly opposite to the interests of England? Could it not be seen, that the King was without legitimate children, and the Duke of York his brother and presumptive heir, not only a Papist, but also a bigot to his Religion? Could the transactions in Scotland be concealed, where arbitrary Power was completely established? I do but just mention some of the principal points, for it would be too tedious to relate all the causes of the nation's suspicions and fears. After this, how is it possible to believe that Shaftsbury's intrigues and artifices were the sole cause of the Commons distrust? I do not doubt that he contributed to them, and that being so well informed, as he was, of the King's secret designs, he opened the eyes of many people who perhaps would have been deceived by the artifices of the Court. But this is not what is meant by ascribing the People's fears and jealousies to the intrigues of this Earl. That he was actuated by a spirit of revenge, is no concern of mine, but the event too plainly showed, how agreeable were his advices to the interest of the Kingdom.

While the alterations the new Council was to bring in the affairs of the Government, were impatiently expected, the Commons were suddenly alarmed by an information of a fresh design of the Papists to burn London a second time. The House of one Bird in Petter-Lane being set on fire, his servant, Elizabeth Oxley, was suspected of firing it on purpose, and sent to prison. She confessed the fact, and declared, she had been employed to do it by one Stubbs a Papist, who had promised her five pounds. Stubbs being taken up, confessed, he persuaded her to it, and that Father Gifford his Confessor put him upon it, telling him, it was no sin to burn all the houses of Heresicks. He added, that he had frequent conferences on this affair with Gifford, and two Irish-men. Moreover Stubbs and the maid-servant declared, the Papists were to make an insurrection, and expected an army of sixty thousand men from France. The Commons obtained a pardon for Stubbs and the servant, in consideration of their ready confession. But it was generally inferred from this incident, that 'twas not Gifford's fault that the City of London was not burnt as in the year 1660.

This accident produced an Address from the Commons to the King, for the execution of Pickering the Jesuit, and the other condemned Priests.

But the Commons stopped not there. The same day they resolved to sit on the morrow, though Sunday, to consider of means for the preservation of the King's person, and the Protestant Religion against the attempts of the Papists, both in the reign of the present King, and his successor. Accordingly the next morning they first ordered a Bill to be brought in to banish all Papists, or reputed Papists, within London and Westminster, twenty miles from the same, for six months; and then they voted, Nemine Contradicente, "That the Duke of York being a Papist, the hopes of his coming such to the Crown, has given the greatest countenance and encouragement to the present conspiracies and designs of the Papists against the King and the Protestant Religion." This vote was sent to the Lords for their concurrence (1).

The 25th of April the Earl of Danby appeared at the Bar of the House of Lords, and there produced the King's pardon for all crimes and offences whatsoever committed before the 28th day of February last. After which he was sent back to the Tower. The Lords having given notice of this to the Commons, they appointed a Committee of Secrecy to examine the nature of the Earl's plea, who made their report, "That there was no precedent, of a pardon granted to any person impeached by the Commons of High-Treason, or other high-crimes depending in the impeachment." After this report, the Commons desired the Lords to demand of the Earl of Danby, Whether he would rely upon, and abide by the plea of his pardon. This was the next day, and the Earl praying time to answer, the Lords allowed him four days.

The same day, the King returned this answer to the Commons address for the execution of Pickering and other Priests: Gentlemen, I have always been tender in matters of blood, which my Subjects have no reason to take exception at: But this is a matter of great weight, I shall therefore consider of it, and return you an answer.

The vote of the Commons concerning the Duke of York touched the King very sensibly, for he saw, they did not intend to stop there. He therefore went to the Parliament the 30th of April, and in a short Speech recommended to both Houses the dispatch of three affairs: 1. The prosecution of the plot. 2. The disbanding of the army.

3. The providing a fleet for the common security. Then to give them a proof of his care to preserve their Religion for the future, he told them, That he had commanded his Chancellor to mention several particulars, which he hoped would be an evidence, that in all things that concerned the publick security, he should not follow their zeal but lead it.

Accordingly, the Chancellor made the following Speech.

My Lords, and you the Knights, Citizens, and Burgeesses of the House of Commons.

"THAT royal care which his Majesty hath taken for the general quiet and satisfaction of all his Subjects, is now more evident by these new and fresh instances of it, which I have in command to open to you. His Majesty hath considered with himself, that it is not enough that your Religion and Liberty is secure during his own Reign, but he thinks he owes it to his People to do all that in him lies, that these blessings may be transmitted to your Posterity, and so well secured to them, that no succession in after-ages may be able to work the least alteration. And therefore his Majesty, who hath often said in this place, That he is ready to consent to any laws of this kind, so as the same extend not to alter the descent of the Crown in the right line, nor to defeat the succession, hath now commanded this to be further explained.

"And to the end it may never be in the power of any Papist, if the Crown descend upon him, to make any change either in Church or State; I am commanded to tell you, That his Majesty is willing, that provision may be made, first to distinguish a Popish from a Protestant Successor; then so to limit and circumscribe the authority of a Popish Successor, in these cases following, that he may be disabled to do any harm: First, in reference to the Church; his Majesty is content that care be taken, that all Ecclesiastical and Spiritual benefices and promotions in gift of the Crown, may be conferred in such a manner, that we may be sure the incumbents shall always be of the most pious and learned Protestants: And that no Popish Successor, while he continues so, may have any power to controul such presentments. In reference to the State, and civil part of the Government, as it is already provided, That no Papist can sit in either House of Parliament; so the King is pleased that it be provided too, that there may never want a Parliament, when the King shall happen to die, but that the Parliament then in being may continue indissoluble for a competent time; or if there be no Parliament in being, then the last Parliament which was in being before that time, may reassemble and sit a competent time, without any new summons, or elections. And as no Papist can by law hold any place of trust, so the King is content that it may be further provided, That no Lords or others of the Privy-Council, no Judges of the Common Law, or in Chancery, shall at any time, during the reign of any Popish Successor, be put in or displaced, but by the authority of Parliament: And that care also be taken, that none but sincere Protestants may be Justices of the Peace. In reference to the military part, the King is willing, that no Lord-Lieutenant, or Deputy-Lieutenant, nor no officer in the Navy, during the reign of any Popish Successor, be put in, or removed, but either by authority of Parliament, or of such persons as the Parliament shall intrust with such authority.

"It is hard to invent another restraint to be put upon a Popish Successor, considering how much the Revenue of the Successor will depend upon consent of Parliament, and how impossible it is to raise money without such consent. But yet, if any thing else can occur to the wisdom of the Parliament, which may further secure Religion and Liberty against a Popish Successor, without defeating the Right of Succession itself, his Majesty will most readily consent to it. Thus watchful is the King for all your safeties; and if he could think of any thing else, that you do either want or wish to make you happy, he would make it his business to effect it for you. God Almighty long continue this blessed union between the King, and his Parliament, and People."

These proposals were not received by the House of Commons with that applause, the King had expected. The Commons distrust was too great for their fears and suspicions to be removed by such offers. Though some authors call this an insatiation in the House of Commons, upon the King's offers relating to the Duke of York's succession, I think myself obliged to remark, that the King offered indeed his consent to Acts of Parliament, but suggested no means to secure the execution. It was an artifice of the Court of England, begun in the reign of James I., and continued under Charles I. and II. to represent the laws as the impregnable bulwark of the nation's liberties. And yet these three Kings had, on several occasions, transgressed them. I shall give here some instances, to which many more might be added. Were the Laws enacted for the preservation of Religion under James I, punctually executed? Of what benefit could Laws made for the security of their Liberties be to the Subjects, since James I. laid down for principle, that though, in conscience and honour, the King ought to govern his Subjects with equity, he might nevertheless by the extent of his power, govern in an absolute manner, without any controul? Did the Petition of Right restrain Charles I. from levying Ship-money? Did the Laws hinder the same King from governing twelve years without a Parliament, and from raising money in that interval by an absolute authority? Had Charles II. been more scrupulous? Was it in virtue of the Laws that he shut up the Exchequer, and seized the Money there without the consent of the proprietors? Was it for the better execution of the Laws, which seem to secure the liberties of the Subject, that he received annually from France a pension of six millions of livres? Of what use therefore are Laws, the execution whereof no human power can warrant, when the interests of the Prince and People are diametrically opposite, which could not fail to happen in the reign of a Popish Successor? This suffices to demonstrate, that the King's offer of his assent to the Acts he proposed, was incapable of dispelling the fears of the People, because not only no expedient was proposed to secure the execution, but it was not even in his power to give any security. But it will be asked, what other expedient was there for securing the Religion and Liberties of the nation, consistent with the right of succession? I confess there was none, and affirm withal, that those offered by the King were insufficient. But to whom was this impossibility owing? To the Duke of York alone, who had openly declared himself a Papist, and from that time incessantly excited both England and France to promote the interests of his Religion, as the letters of his Secretary Coleman manifestly show. To enable the Reader to judge of this matter, being the most material of this reign, I shall here propose some questions which are necessary to be decided before he can determine in favour of the King or Parliament.

Question the first. Whether there was any danger to England in admitting a Popish Successor?

This the King himself did not deny, since he proposed expedients to prevent this danger?

2d Question. Whether the expedients proposed by the King, were capable of preventing this danger?

This is what no Person can either positively affirm or deny. For if, on one hand, it may be supposed, that a popish successor would have sincerely complied with the Acts proposed by the King, it may, on the other hand, with equal justice be supposed, that the Duke of York, the immediate successor, considering his principles, his humour, his temper, his zeal for his Religion, would never have patiently suffered himself to be restrained by these Acts of Parliament. But this was a contingency which God alone could foreknow.

3d Question. The Commons not believing the expedients offered by the King sufficient to prevent the danger, and the King believing the contrary, who was to yield, the King, or the People represented by the Commons?

This is what I shall not pretend to decide.

4th Question. Which evil was greatest, That of breaking the lineal Succession in the exclusion of the Duke of York, or that of exposing the established Religion to ruin?

This Question supposes, that the Kings of England succeeded by a Right purely Hereditary. But this supposition is greatly contested. It may at least be affirmed, that several Parliaments have decided the contrary (1). As to the question in itself, it may at least be averred, that in France, in a parallel case, upon the death of Henry III, the interests of the Catholic Religion were, without hesitation, preferred to those of Henry IV, who was a Protestant, and the next Heir: But many pretended, that as the French did ill, so the English Parliament was to blame to imitate them.

5th Question. The two evils, namely, the breach in the Succession, and the exposing of the Protestant Religion, being supposed perfectly equal, which was to suffer, the Rights of the Duke, or the Religion of the Nation?

Some pretend, that the right of Succession is not to be violated upon any consideration, and that the interests of Religion extend not so far as to authorize such a violation. Others on the contrary maintain, That when things were reduced to such a state, that the Duke or the People must suffer, the Duke ought to be the sufferer, since it was he who had brought matters to that state.

The Reader ought to determine these questions, before he gives a definitive sentence upon this affair.

(1) Particularly an Act passed in Queen Elizabeth's reign, asserting the Power of the Parliament to limit the Succession of the Crown.

The day after the King's and the Chancellor's Speeches to both Houses, the Commons, without taking any great notice of his Majesty's proposals about the Succession, proceeded on the Bill for preventing the dangers arising from Popery, as well in his reign, as his successor's.

They also read the first time a Bill for better prevention of illegal exaction of money from the Subject; and ordered another to be brought in, "That when any member of the House was preferred to any office or place of profit, a new Writ should immediately issue out for electing a member to serve in his stead."

The 5th of May they resolved, "That the pardon pleaded by the Earl of Danby was illegal and void", and the Speaker, with the whole House, went up to the Lords Bar, and demanded judgment against him.

Shortly after they drew up an address against the Duke of Lauderdale, in the strongest terms that could be used, which was carried in a full body to the King. But it seems the King could not then part with this Minister, the last of the Cabal, and therefore he coldly answered, That he would consider of it, and return an answer.

In the mean time, the King sent a message to the Commons by the Lord Russell, who acquainted the House, "That his Majesty commanded him to let the House know, that he was willing to comply with the request concerning Pickering, and that the law should pass upon him accordingly: That as to the condemned Priests, the House of Peers had sent for them, in order, as his Majesty conceived, to some examinations. That he repeated his instances to them for putting the Fleet in a good posture, for dispatching the discovery of the plot, the trial of the Lords, and the Bill for the security of Religion."

After this message, the Commons finished the Money-bill for disbanding the army, which the King passed the 9th of May. By this Act a supply was granted to the King of two hundred and six thousand, four hundred sixty-two pounds, seventeen shillings and three-pence, for paying off and disbanding the forces raised since the 20th of September 1677. The Act had a clause in it, that for the future, Soldiers should not be quartered in any person's house against their consent.

At the same time the Lords informed the Commons, that the Earl of Danby resolved to adhere to the plea of his Pardon; and that the Commons having demanded judgment against him, as conceiving his pardon illegal and null, the tenth instant was appointed for hearing the Earl of Danby to make good his plea. The Lords likewise acquainted the Commons, that they had resolved, the five Lords in the Tower should be brought to their trials the 14th instant.

The part of the message concerning the Earl of Danby so offended the Commons, that they resolved, "That no Commoner whatsoever should presume to maintain the validity of the pardon pleaded by the Earl of Danby, without the consent of the House first had, and that the persons so doing, should be accounted betrayers of the Liberties of the Commons of England." This vote was posted up in several places, that no person might be ignorant of it. The true reason of these proceedings was, that by the examination of the several articles of the Earl's impeachment, the Commons hoped to discover the King's secret practices with the Court of France; whereas the King by his pardon had put the affair in such a state, that there would have been no occasion to examine the Earl of Danby's answers to the articles exhibited against him.

The vote of the Commons much inflamed the differences that were already begun between the two Houses, about the manner of proceeding against the five Lords in the Tower. For the Lords had addressed the King to appoint a Lord High-Steward to preside in the trials; but the Commons, thinking it unnecessary, proposed, "That a Committee of both Houses might be nominated to consider of the most proper ways and methods of proceeding upon impeachments." And this is what the Lords refused, which occasioned a warm dispute; but at last the Lords agreed to the nomination of the Committee.

The same day the Lords communicated to the House of Commons, a petition from the Earl of Danby, in which he set forth, "That he met with informations severally from his Council, that he durst not appear to argue the validity of his pardon, by reason of the vote of the House of Commons." Their Lordships therefore desired to know, Whether there was any such vote as was alledged in the Petition?

It appears plainly in the proceedings of the Commons, that they only sought occasion to drive things to extremity. With this view, they presented an address to the King, taking notice, "That multitudes of Jesuits, Popish Priests, and Popish Reculants, resorted to the cities of London thered strength, sent the Duke of Monmouth at the head of some English forces, who were joined by some Scotch regiments. The Duke discharged his commission with such bravery and success, that the 22d of June he entirely defeated the rebels, [at Batwell bridge], killed eight hundred, and took about twelve hundred prisoners. Several were hanged, and the rest were transported.

Shortly after the prorogation of the Parliament, the five Jesuits, Whitebread, Harcourt, Fenwick, Gawen, and Turner, were tried. The 13th of June they were brought to the Old Baily, where their indictment was read, and the witnesses heard.

Oates's evidence was, "1. That the great Consult of the 24th of April 1678, was by order of Whitebread the Provincial, and that he, Fenwick, Harcourt, and Turner, did all in his presence sign the resolve for the King's death. 2. That Whitebread, after his return to St. Omer's, did say, He hoped to see the black Fool's head at Whitehall, laid fast enough; and if his Brother should appear to follow his footsteps, his passport should be made."

"3. That in July, Abby a Priest, brought over instructions from Whitebread, to offer Sir George Wakeman ten thousand pounds to poison the King; and also a commission to Sir John Gage to be an officer in the army they designed to raise, which the witness delivered to Sir John."

"4. As for Gawen, though he could not positively say, he saw him at the consult, yet he saw his hand subscribed to the resolve: And that in July 1678, he gave them in London, an account how prosperous their affairs were in Staffordshire and Shropshire; that the Lord Stafford was very diligent, and that there was two or three thousand pounds ready there to carry on the design; all which he afterwards heard him declare in Father Ireland's chamber."

Stephen Dugdale, a new witness, deposed, "1. Against Whitebread, that he saw a letter under his hand to Father Evers a Jesuit, and Confessor to the witness; in which he ordered him to be sure to chuse men that were hardy and trusty, no matter whether they were Gentlemen: And he swore what they were to do; that the words under his hand were in express terms, — For killing the King."

"2. Against Gawen he swore, that he entertained the witness to be of the conspiracy to murder the King, as one of those resolute fellows described by Whitebread; and for that end they had several consultations in the Country; as at Besicobol, and at Tixall in September 1678. And he heard them talk in one of those consults, that it was the opinion of the Monks at Paris, who were to assist in the conspiracy, That as soon as the deed was done, they should lay it on the Protestants, and so provoke the other Protestants to cut their throats. That he had intercepted and read above a hundred letters to the same purpose, to be delivered by private marks, known to Father Evers."

"3. That the witness himself was so zealous in the cause, that he had given them four hundred pounds for carrying on the design, which Gawen had made him believe was not only lawful, but meritorious; and that he was to be sent up to London by Harcourt, there to be instructed about killing the King."

"4. That the same Harcourt did write word to Father Evers, of Sir Edmundbury Godfrey's being dispatched, that very night it was done; so that they knew of it in Staffordshire several days before it was commonly known in London (1). And to confirm this testimony, he produced Mr. Chetwin, a Gentleman, who swore, he did hear it reported as from Mr. Dugdale; and that he was not in town when the murderers of Sir Edmundbury Godfrey were tried, or else he then would have witnessed the same."

"5. Against Turner he swore, "That he saw him with others, at Evers's chamber; where they consulted together to carry on this design, of bringing in Popery by killing the King."

France deposed, "1. That Harcourt one day paying him for an image of the Virgin Mary, told him, there was a design of killing the King: 2. And that Fenwick told him in Ireland's chamber, that there should be fifty thousand men in arms, in a readiness to settle their Religion, and that they should be commanded by the Lords Bolles, Powis, and Arundel of Wardour."

Bedlie deposed, "1. That he had seen Whitebread and Fenwick at several consults about the plot; and that he had heard Whitebread at Harcourt's chamber, tell Coleman, the manner of sending the four Russians to Wind for to kill the King."

"2. That he saw Harcourt take out of a cabinet about fourscore or a hundred pounds, to give to a messenger, to be carried to the said Russians, with a guinea to the messenger, to drink Mr. Coleman's health."

"3. That Whitebread told him, that Pickering was to have a great number of Maffes, and Grove fifteen hundred pounds for killing the King."

"4. That Harcourt employed him three several times to carry their consults beyond the seas; and that in Harcourt's presence, he received Coleman's thanks for his fidelity, and that Harcourt recommended him to the Lord Arundel, who promised him great favour when the times were turned: Also that he saw Harcourt give Wakeman a Bill to receive two thousand pounds, in part of a greater sum; and heard Sir George say, fifteen thousand pounds was a small reward for the settling of Religion, and preserving the Three Kingdoms from ruin."

Besides these evidences, there was a letter found amongst Harcourt's papers, from one Petre a Jesuit, which named a meeting designed on the 24th of April 1678. This letter served to fortify Oates's evidence of the Grand Consult. But this was explained by the prisoners to signify a triennial meeting about the choice of a Procurator to be sent to Rome, though not to the full satisfaction of the Court, which looked upon it as an evasion.

The defence made by the prisoners was various and long. Besides their frequent asseverations and protestations of their innocence (2), and their ignorance of any designs against the King, they much argued against the witnesses, insisting: "That to the making of a credible witness, there must be integrity of Life, truth of Testimony, and probability of Matter; but the witnesses against them, Oates, Bedloe, France, and Dugdale, were men of desperate fortunes, and flagitious persons, and that false swearing was their livelihood."

I cannot forbear remarking here by the way, that if this maxim, That to make a credible witness, there must be integrity of life, was received without restriction, it would be almost impossible to prove such plots as this, because commonly, only villains engage in them, and they are discovered by complices.

"They alleged particularly the great improbability of trusting Oates with secrets of the highest importance, when he was turned away from St. Omer's for his misdemeanours and immoralities, which were so great, that he was denied the Sacrament. They charged him with contradictions, with relation to his former evidences." These contradictions consisted, in that Oates had said before the Council, that he knew no more, and yet added many things afterwards. I shall not repeat here what I have said elsewhere.

They produced about sixteen witnesses to prove, "that Oates had been all April, May, and till the latter end of June 1678, at St. Omer's; and that they saw him every day, and conversed and dined with him, and that he was never out of the College, except two days and one night he was at Watton, and two or three he was in the Infirmary, &c. and consequently he could not be at the Consult of the 24th of April."

And further they proved, "That Sir John Warner, and Sir Thomas Preston, whom Oates had sworn to come over with him to the Consult, were all that time beyond the seas, one at Watton, the other at Liege."

And moreover, to show that Oates was not a man to be credited, they produced eleven witnesses to prove, "That Father Ireland, who was executed, was not at London, and made it appear directly contrary to what he had sworn upon his trial. They added, "that if the evidence of their side should be rejected because they were Roman Catholics, all commerce with several countries would be destroyed."

The Chief Justice replied, that they had no room to complain of the witnesses being rejected by the Court, since, on the contrary, their depositions were received without any scruple, and that it belonged to the Jury to determine upon their evidence as they saw cause."

In answer to these accusations, Oates alleged, "That his coming to London to the Consult was very private; yet he produced six witnesses to testify they saw him there about that time, but in a sort of a disguise (3). But none spoke very home but Mr. Smith a Schoolmaster 1679. Gawen offered to undergo the Ordeal, or fiery Trial over red hot plow-shares, as a test of his innocence. But, besides that this way of proving an accused person's innocence had been abolished six hundred years, and consequently was not to be allowed by the Court, it is certain that when the Trial by Ordeal was practised, it was never admitted but where evidences failed, which could not be said of Gawen.

Harcourt urged in his defence, with regard to the letter said to be writ by him to Evers concerning Godfrey's death, That he must have been mad to send such a letter by the post.

The Jury, after a short consideration, returned, and brought in all the five prisoners guilty of High-Treason; but sentence was repit till the next day, on which came on the trial of Richard Langborn a Popish Counsellor at Law of the Temple, and much employed by the Papists. Being brought to the same place with the five Jesuits, and before the same persons, with a new Jury, Oates appeared and swore:

1. That the prisoner held correspondence with la Chaise and others, and that the witnesses carried several letters to persons beyond the seas; in one of which he saw under his own hand, words to this purpose, That the Parliament began to flag in promoting the Protestant Religion, and now they had a fair opportunity to begin and give the blow, with other expressions plain enough concerning the plot.

2. That he had orders from the Provincial Whitebread, to give Mr. Langborn an account of the Resolve of the great Council, April the 24th 1678, and upon acquainting him with it, Langborn lifted up his hands and eyes, and prayed to God to give it good success.

3. That he saw in his chamber certain Commissions which they called Patents; and that he permitted the witnesses to peruse several of them: One was to the Lord Arundel of Warder, to be Lord Chancellor, another to the Lord Powis, to be Treasurer, and one to the prisoner, to be advocate of the army; all signed Johannes Paulus de Oliva, by virtue of a brief from the Pope.

4. That being employed as a solicitor for several of the Fathers of the Society, the prisoner prevailed upon the Benedictine Monks, to raise six thousand pounds for carrying on the cause; and said in his hearing, That he would do his utmost for procuring the money.

5. That he was disgusted, that Sir George Wakeman was not contented with ten thousand pounds to poison the King, and called him, a narrow-spirited, and narrow-souled Physician; who, for so publick a cause, ought to have done it for nothing.

6. An Instrument being produced, signed Paulus de Oliva, found in Langborn's chamber; Oates swore, "That the forementioned Commissions were signed by the same hand; but they were all conveyed away, and this being only an Ecclesiastical business, and not dangerous as they thought, was left behind."

In the next place Bedloe swore, "1. That going with Coleman to the prisoner's chamber, the former gave him his letters to Father la Chaise, the Pope's Nuncio, and others, open, to read, and register in a book kept by him for that purpose; and that some of the expressions in these letters were, To let la Chaise know, they waited only now for his answer, How far he had proceeded with the French King, for the sending of money; for they only wanted money, all other things being in readiness. That the Catholics of England were in safety; that places and offices had been disposed to them, and that all garrisons either were, or suddenly would be, in their hands; and now they had a fair opportunity, having a King that was so easy to believe what was dictated to him by the Catholic Party.

2. That he brought other letters from Harcourt to Langborn to be registered; of which letters, one was for the Rector of the Irish College at Salamanca, which specified, That the Lord Bellasis, and the rest of the Lords concerned should be in readiness, for that they had sent some Irish cashiered soldiers, with many Lay-brothers, under the notion of Pilgrims from St. Iago, who were to take shipping at the Groyne, and to land at Milford haven, and there to join with the Lord Powis."

Mr. Langborn in his defence, besides the solemn protestations of his innocence, alleged, "That Oates and Bedloe, the witnesses against him, were Parties in the crime,

"and desired to know, whether they had their pardons."

Upon understanding that Bedloe had three, and Oates had two under the Broad-seal; he insisted, "That they were still approvers in the eyes of the law, and therefore not to be heard; and desired to know, if they expected any rewards for their discoveries." Oates replied upon oath, "That he had been rewarded by expending six or seven hundred pounds out of his own pocket, without knowing if he should ever see it again." Langborn then alleged, "He had heard Bedloe had received five hundred pounds"; but he was answered, "That that was for the discovery of Sir Edmundbury Godfrey's murder, and not for the plot." And Bedloe swore, "That he was so far from having any benefit for that discovery, that he was seven hundred pounds out of pocket." When the prisoner insisted upon the improbability of their assertions, by reason of their great necessities and poverty, when they first made their discoveries, he was told, "That such enquiries were foreign to the matter in hand." And so he proceeded to prove Oates to be perjured, with respect to the Council in April 24, and to the business of Father Ireland, by the same witnesses that had been used by the five Jesuits the day before. Whereupon the Chief Justice told him, that a witness could not be rejected as perjured, unless he was declared so upon a trial, and therefore his allegation could not be of any service to him.

As Oates had formerly sworn, that he lay at Grove's house about the time of the Council, he brought Mrs. Grove to testify, that he never was there about that time; which was confirmed by her maid; and both affirmed, that the house was taken up, and that there was no room to lodge him. The Court thereupon said, that being disguised he might lodge there without being known.

While this trial was depending, [Roger Palmer] Earl of Casslemain came into the Hall, and told the Judges, That the mob used violence to the witnesses who had deposed in favour of the prisoners, and that they were in danger of their lives; upon this the Court ordered immediate inquiry to be made after the authors of these violences, in order to punish them according to their desert.

In conclusion, the Jury brought in Langborn guilty, and Langborn is he received sentence, together with the five Jesuits, who had been tried the day before.

On the 20th of June, the five Jesuits were executed, protesting their innocence. Whitebread in particular, declared, "That he renounced from his heart all manner of Absolutions, Dispensations for Swearing, &c. which some had been pleased to lay to the Jesuits charge, thinking them unjustifiable, and unlawful." Langborn was reprieved for a month (1). He was executed the 14th of July, and died, protesting his innocence of the crimes for which he was condemned. It was the wonder of many, that so able a Lawyer, if he was innocent, had made so weak a defence.

As the death of these five Jesuits, and of the three before executed, made a great noise, and as to this day they are believed innocent by some, and guilty by others; I cannot forbear to make a few reflections upon this subject, to assist the reader to judge impartially.

1. The truth will never be discovered, if men suffer themselves to be swayed by religious prejudices. If we believe an accused person guilty, because he is a Papist or Jesuit, or if for the same reason we believe him innocent, all examination is vain. The prejudiced person always finds reason and justice in one or other of these two opinions, and therefore he must, if possible, divest himself of his prejudices.

2. The condemned Jesuits were accused of three things; of a design to kill the King; to subvert the Government; to root out the Protestant Religion. And yet, most of the evidences against them ran only upon the first of these three articles, the two others being supposed. It is nevertheless upon this supposition, that the accusation of themselves to kill the King is built, because it is pretended, that the aim of the conspirators was to place the Duke of Tork on the throne, as more proper to advance their designs than the King his brother. But this pretension is not proved, nor does it appear in the evidences produced against them, that this was their aim.

3. But on the other hand, it can hardly be denied, that throughout this whole reign, there was a settled design to render the King absolute, and introduce the Popish Religion. This must be the meaning of these expressions, To subvert the Government, and destroy the Protestant Religion. This being supposed, it is not improbable, that the Papists and Jesuits might believe, that their project would be sooner executed if the King was removed, and the Duke of Tork placed on the throne.

(1) In hopes of his making some discovery. He offered to declare what Estates and Stock the Jesuits had in England; but protested he could make no other discovery. Barnet p. 466.

2. It is therefore upon this probability, that the Jesuits have been accused of projecting to kill the King. It is supposed, that being concerned in the general design, or the plot, they believed the King's death a proper means to hasten the execution, and here the witnesses were very po-

5. The defences of the prisoners consisted chiefly, 1. In asseverations and protestations of their innocence. 2. In the depositions of the witnesses from St. Omer's, and Staffordshire, who proved, that Oates was not at London the 24th of April 1678. 3. In the improbabilities in the evidence given by Oates and Bedloe. Upon these three heads I propose to make some reflections.

1. The protestations and asseverations of the accused during their trial are not to be regarded. But when they are carried to the point of death, they ought to be considered. If they are not a positive proof, they form at least a presumption, because Papists are not less convinced than Protestants, that lying is not the way to escape the just judgment of God, before whom they are shortly to appear; and that, besides, these Protestations never prevail for a reversal of the sentence. I am aware that the Jesuits are accused of approving equivocations and mental reservations. But, without examining how far this charge may be proved, it is certain, that Father Whitebread, upon the ladder, testified an abhorrence of this doctrine, and renounced all Pardons and Dispensations from the Pope, or any other power for swearing or speaking against the truth (1). It is not therefore impossible, that without there was passion or prejudice in the Judges and Juries, the Jesuits, though innocent, would have been condemned upon false evidence. Accordingly, this is what many pretend: But there are others who carry the thing further, and maintain, that the accused might have been acquitted, if the passion and prejudice of the Judges and Juries had not prevented it. This we shall examine in the next article.

2. I have elsewhere spoken of the defence, founded upon the proof of the Alibi, which obliges the Judge to render justice by chance, since, there being a direct contrariety between the evidences, the Judges cannot be satisfied on which side the truth lies. Oates deposed, That he had assisted at the grand Consult in London April 1678. He produced seven witnesses, who affirmed, that they saw him in London at that time. The Jesuits on their side produced sixteen witnesses, who affirmed, that Oates was at St. Omer's at the same time. It must be therefore, either that Oates and his witnesses, or those of the Jesuits, were false. Now, that which probably determined the Jury to bring in the Jesuits guilty was: First, The prisoners objected only a bare denial to the testimonies of Prance, Dugdale, and Bedloe, which could not but breed a disadvantageous prejudice against them. Secondly, The witnesses from St. Omer's were all scholars, or persons depending upon the Jesuits College, another consideration capable to pre-possess the Jury. Lastly, The question was to examine a plot contrived by Papists, as such, and in favour of their Religion, and not as private persons, incited by other passions. In this case, it is not very strange, that the evidences given by Papists appeared suspicious. For it is certain, at that time, the opinion, supported by the votes of two several Parliaments, that there was a real plot to subvert the Protestant Religion, was generally embraced throughout the whole Kingdom.

As to the superiority of sixteen witnesses against seven, this could occasion no difficulty. For seven witnesses dispersed in London, who had only accidentally seen Oates, were as credible as the sixteen shut up in one house at St. Omer's (2). And though there had been but two from St. Omer's, yet, all other circumstances being equal, they would have been as credible as the seven witnesses of London.

3. I proceed now to the improbabilities in the depositions of Oates and Bedloe. First, It is difficult to conceive the necessity of resolving the King's death in an assembly of fifty Jesuits. Secondly, it may with reason be supposed, that an affair of such importance as the assassination of a King, passes thro' the hands of those only who are most distinguished in the Society, either by their posts or capacity. But it is hardly credible, that fifty such could be found in England or at St. Omer's. Thirdly, I know not that any person, to this day, has positively affirmed that Oates was a Jesuit. And yet he not only appears in the grand consult of the 24th of April, but has an office in it of great trust and importance, namely, to carry the resolution of killing the King, to the several Companies into which the assembly was divided. Fourthly, It is not said, at what time Oates turned Papist; but 'tis only seen, he was first employed in 1677, to carry letters to Spain. He returned about the end of the same year, and shortly after was sent to St. Omer's, where he continued but three or four months. Now it is not probable, that this short stay at St. Omer's could have acquired him the confidence of the heads of the Society, to such a degree, as to be sent to London to assist in a grand Consult, where the King's murder was to be resolved. Fifthly, Why was Bedloe to be admitted into so great a secret, he who was to have no share in the execution? And yet he speaks of it as a thing with which he was perfectly acquainted, not only from letters which he might have opened, but it appears even by his depositions, that the heads of the conspiracy, Ireland, Whitebread, Harcourt, Coleman, Langhorn, used no caution with him; from whence it may be inferred, that they themselves imparted to him the secret. He is at Harcourt's chamber, when the money is ordering for the four Irish men who were to kill the King. He is at the same chamber when the Queen's Physician receives a note of two thousand pounds Sterling, without any apparent necessity of his presence in an affair of that nature. Sixthly, Oates and Bedloe were men of mean birth, who had been only employed as letter-carriers. They were besides little distinguished for their capacity, or talents, and yet they are admitted into all the most important secrets of the Plot. Lastly, It appears in the depositions of Oates and Bedloe, that the conspirators talked together, and writ to one another, concerning the King's murder, as if it had been but a trifle, and without even taking the usual precautions on such occasions, of disguising their thoughts in ambiguous expressions.

These are improbabilities which give but too much occasion to suspect the credit of these two witnesses. It will perhaps be said, that a thing is not false because it is improbable; and that God sometimes permits the most wary villains to ruin themselves by a too great confidence in others. This may be, and it may also be, that this was not the present case. At least it may be affirmed, that the Jesuits are not wont to proceed with so little caution.

These are the improbabilities that have induced many People, though periwaded of the reality of the plot, as far as it concerned the Government and Religion, to suspend their judgment with regard to the King's murder. The same improbabilities likewise have furnished others with a pretence for denying the whole plot, because they are pleased to confine it to that single article, in which they impose upon themselves, or else are delirious to impose upon their Readers.

The 10th of July the King, contrary to the advice of his new Council, which he seemed to have resolved to follow with an entire deference, dissolved the Parliament, and summoned another to meet the 17th of October. He hoped to find the next more tractable, but was very much deceived. The People, who no longer regarded what came from the Court, affected to send such members as were of the Country-party, as being the most proper to oppose the Designs of the King. The Earl of Shaftsbury was at the head of this party, and without doubt greatly contributed to inflame the passions of the People. But it is perhaps saying too much, to charge this Lord with all the King's late mortifications. If it could be proved, that the King had never given any occasion of discontent to his People, we should be obliged to recur to some extraordinary cause of the Parliament's ill humour, as the intrigues, cabals, and artifices of some powerful and popular person. But what need is there to seek for an extraordinary cause, when one so naturally offers in the whole conduct of the King, who had hitherto shown, that his interests, and those of his People were intirely different?

The 18th of June, Sir George Wakeman the Queen's Physician was brought to his trial, together with James Corker, William Marshal, two Benedictine Monks, and William Runley, a Lay-brother of that Order. Oates and Bedloe were the witnesses against them. But, besides that their depositions were imperfect, and the greatest part upon hearsay, and could pass for proofs only on the supposition of the design to poison the King, which was not well proved, the Jury doubtless considered that a person of Sir George Wakeman's sense, would never trust such a secret to Bedloe, whom he scarce knew. Nay, he swore that he never saw Bedloe before in his life. However this be, the prisoners were acquitted, to the great mortification of

(1) Rapin seems not to have taken notice of a passage in Burnet on this occasion. One Serjeant, a secular Priest, a zealous Papist in his way, some months after these Executions, appeared before the Council upon Security given him, and avowed, that Gowen, the Jesuit, who died protesting he had never thought it lawful to murder Kings, but had always held away the King's life for the injuries he had done her, but which more because he was a Heretic. Upon that Serjeant ran out many particulars, to show how little Credit was due to the Protestation made by the Jesuits, even at their death, p. 466.

1679. the two witnesses, since it was easy to see, that Oates and Bedloe were evidences capable of swearing to things of which they had no perfect knowledge (1).

About the end of August, the King being at Windsor, was seized with three violent fits of an intermitting fever, which gave great apprehension. The Earl of Essex and the Lord Hallifax, two of the four Counsellors which then managed the King's affairs, fearing, if the King died, to fall into the hands of the Duke of Monmouth, and the Earl of Shaftsbury, advised the King to fend for the Duke of York, which was done with all possible speed and secrecy; for the Duke was at Windsor the 2d of September. But the King, being then out of danger, pretended a surprize at his arrival. But this dissimulation was not capable to deceive the Duke of Monmouth and the Earl of Shaftsbury. On the other hand, the Earl of Essex and the Lord Hallifax, finding that they had made Monmouth and Shaftsbury their irreconcilable enemies, joined with the Duke of York for their destruction. They succeeded so well, that the King removed the Duke of Monmouth from his post of Captain-general, and sent him into Holland, to the great surprize of the whole Court, for the Duke of Monmouth was in the height of the King's favour before the Duke of York's arrival (2). Shortly after, Shaftsbury also was turned out from being President of the Council (3). Thus the Court had a new face, and the Duke of York was more powerful than ever. He improved this happy juncture to obtain the King's leave to retire to Scotland, representing to him the danger of his being in the Low Countries, in case of his Majesty's death. Accordingly he returned to Brussels, to bring home his Duchess and the Princess Anne, and arriving shortly after at London, departed for Scotland.

The Duke of Monmouth and Shaftsbury in disgrace. Kennet. Echard.

October 7. If Dr. Burnet is believed, in the History of his own times, he governed Scotland in an arbitrary manner, and gave manifest tokens of his cruelty, and inveterate hatred to the Presbyterians.

Every one impatiently expected, where would end the late alterations at Court, and it was not long before it appeared. The 15th of October the King summoning his Council, after a little pause told them, That upon many considerations which he could not at present acquaint them with, he found it necessary to make a longer prorogation of the Parliament than he intended: That he had considered all the consequences so far as to be absolutely refused, and not to hear any thing that should be said against it: That he would have the meeting put off, till that time twelvemonth. The Counsellors surprized at this resolution, and fill more at the manner of proposing it, were most of them silent. Some however offering to represent to the King the dangerous consequences of this resolution, were enjoined silence. But Sir William Temple, more bold than the rest, stood up, and with great freedom told his Majesty, "That as to the resolution he had taken, he would say nothing, because he was resolved to hear no reasoning upon it; therefore he would only presume to offer him his humble advice as to the course of his future proceedings; which was, That his Majesty in his affairs would please to make use of some Council or other, and allow freedom to their debates and advices; after hearing which, his Majesty might yet resolve as he pleased. That if he did not think the persons or number of this present Council suited with his affairs, it was in his power to dissolve them, and constitute another of any number he pleased, and to alter them again when he would; But, to make Counsellors that should not counsel, he doubted whether it was in his Majesty's power or not, because it implied a contradiction: And so far as he had observed, either of former ages, or the present, he questioned, whether it was a thing ever practised in England by his Majesty's predecessors, or were so now by any of the present Princes in Christendom: Therefore he humbly advised him to constitute some such Council, as he would think fit to make use of, in the digestion of his great and publick affairs."

This proceeding caused several Counsellors to surrender their commissions to the King, and others to absent themselves from the Council (4), not thinking proper to encourage by their presence, the King's secret resolutions, and give occasion to believe, they approved them. The Earl of Essex resigned his place of first Commissioner of the Treasury. The Lord Hallifax, Sir William Temple, and some others, retired into the country. Thus the Council which the King had appointed to amuse the people, was almost dissolved, and the direction of the publick affairs remained in the hands of the Earl of Sunderland, Mr. Lawrence Hyde, and Mr. Sidney Godolphin (5); or rather the Duke of York, whose interests they had embraced; and who, though absent, directed their resolutions.

In the latter end of October, about a fortnight after the prorogation of the Parliament, a sham plot was discovered, contrived by the Papists to bring an odium upon the Presbyterians, and the heads of the Country-party. This project had been formed the beginning of August, by the Countess of Powis, Elizabeth Collier a midwife, the Earl of Castlemain, and the five Lords in the Tower. The design was to make use of false witnesses to accuse Oates of perjury and sodomy; to assassinate the Earl of Shaftsbury, and to charge the Duke of Buckingham, the Earl of Essex, the Duke of Monmouth, the Lord Hallifax, and several considerable citizens of London, with being concerned in a plot against the King. One Dangerfield was to be the principal actor in this scene (6). He received his instructions from the Lady Powis, and the Lords in the Tower, with a list of the persons whom he was to accuse (7). Moreover, the Lady Powis, gave him a model of this plot, which he was to convey into the house of some pretended conspirator, and there cause it to be found.

Dangerfield furnished with these Instructions and papers, informed the Duke of York of it, after his arrival from Brussels. The Duke of York made him a present of twenty guineas, and introduced him to the King, who, after hearing him, gave him forty more. Then he made some attempts to assassinate the Earl of Shaftsbury, but was prevented by several accidents. At last, on pretence of seeing some rooms, which he said he intended to hire, he went to Colonel Manfel's lodgings (8), and found means to pin some dangerous papers behind his bed's head. This done, he informed two officers of the Custom-house, that there were in those lodgings, prohibited goods to the value of two thousand pounds. The officers repairing thither the 22d of October, searched every where in hopes of finding their prey; but as they did not think to search behind the bed, Dangerfield himself found the papers. The officers carrying these papers to their superiors, had orders to return them to Manfel. Four or five days after, the Colonel meeting Dangerfield in the street, carried him directly to Whitehall, and brought him before the King and Council. He was strictly examined, and, after a full hearing, his contrivance being detected, he was sent to Newgate the 27th of October.

Two days after, Sir William Waller, a magistrate of London, searching Cellier's house, found the model of the pretended plot, writ very fair, in a paper-book tied with ribbands, and hid in a Meal-tub, which gave it the name of the Meal-Tub-Plot. Dangerfield perceiving himself ruined, if he persisted in a thing which he could not support, applied himself to the Lord-Mayor of London, and gave him in writing a large confession upon oath, with a discovery of the persons by whom he was employed. This confession being transmitted to the Council, several persons were apprehended (9), and amongst the rest [Roger Palmer] Earl of Castlemain. The Lady Powis, accused by others, besides Dangerfield, of conspiring the death of the King, was sent to the Tower, and ordered to be prosecuted for high-treason. This affair greatly contributed to the resolution taken by the Earl of Essex and the Lord Hallifax, to retire from Court, because they observed, that though they were mentioned in the plot, they were left out of secret examinations about it.

1680. visiting him, Bedloe in his presence signed the following deposition.

"That the Duke of York hath been so far engaged in the plot, as he hath been by letters in Cardinal Barberini's Secretary's Study, that no part that hath been proved against any man already, that hath suffered, but that to the full those letters have made him guilty of it; all but what tended to the King's death." And at Rome I asked Father Anderton and Father Lodge, two Jesuits, What would the Duke do with his brother when he was King? And they answered me, they would find a means for that; they would give him no trouble about it. Then I told them, I believed the Duke loved his brother so well, he would suffer no violence to be done to him. They said, No. If the Duke could be brought to that, as he had been religiously to every thing else, they might do their work; their other business was ready, and they might do it presently. But they knew they could not bring him to that point; but they would take care for that themselves: they had not begun with him to leave him in such scruples as that. But they would jet him into his throne; and there he should reign blindfold three or four days; for they had settled some they should pitch the action upon, should cleave their party. And then he should fly upon them with the sword of revenge.

And this examiner doth further add, "That the Queen is not, to this examiner's knowledge, nor by any thing he could ever find out, any way concerned in the murder of the King; but barely by her letters, consenting and promising to contribute what money she could to the introducing the Catholic Religion. Nay, it was a great while, and it made her weep, before she could be brought to that."

He also declared to the Lord Chief-Justice, [That he looked upon himself as a dying man, and found within himself, that he could not last long, but must shortly appear before the Lord of Hosts, to give an account of all his actions. And because many persons had made it their business to baffle and deride the plot, he did, for the satisfaction of the world, there declare, upon the faith of a dying man, and as he hoped for salvation,] That whatever he had testified concerning the plot was true: And that he had wronged no man by his testimony, but had testified rather under than over what was truth;—and, that he had other things to discover, which were of great importance to the King and the Country, with other matters of the like nature. In conclusion, his Lordship was desired to represent to his Majesty his condition, and that his sickness was very chargeable, and move his Majesty in his behalf for some supply of money for his subsistence.

This deposition deserves some remarks. The first, that it comes from a dying man, and who indeed died three days after. If the protestations of those who had been condemned, either for the plot, or Godfrey's murder, may form a presumption in their favour, I don't see why this of dying Bedloe should not form the like, unless the point in question is taken for granted, namely, that the condemned persons were innocent, and Bedloe a villain for swearing against them. 2. Bedloe distinguishes perfectly the several articles of the plot, in that he accuses the Duke of York of being engaged in the plot, but acquits him from deluging the King's murder. Now the plot, with regard to the Government and Religion is so evident, and the part the Duke of York had in it so clear from Coleman's letters, that nothing can better agree with Bedloe's deposition. Thirdly, it is really improbable, that two Jesuits at Rome, directors of so important an affair, should speak so openly to Bedloe. But on the other hand, the manner of the King's death three or four years after Bedloe's, gives but too just cause to suspect, there was foul play, and causes this improbability to vanish in part. Lastly, Bedloe declared in his deposition, That whatever he had testified concerning the plot was true, and this last deposition, far from giving room to suspect it of falshood, may rather create a belief, that it was not an invention, since, being so near death, he could have no inducement to acquit the Duke of York upon one article, and accuse him upon others, or even to trouble the Chief-Justice with any deposition at all.

This deposition a little perplexes a famous Historian, who in this part of his history undertakes to prove the plot to be a fiction. To free himself from this difficulty, he scruples not to oppose his own authority to Bedloe's deposition. "We know not, says he, how to speak softly of the dying words of one threatened by many years villainies; but must expressly declare, that as to his publick oaths he did not only swear to the most shocking im-probabilities, but sometimes changed, and other times

"contradicted his own evidence." After this authority no man, doubtless, will regard this last deposition of Bedloe, otherwise than as a continuation of the crimes he had been guilty of, in falsely swearing there was a plot, when in reality there was none.

The city of London was then in the Country-party, which gave it great reputation. The choice, on Midsummer day, for Sheriffs, fell upon two famous Presbyterians, by a majority of voices, both accounted Phanatics by the contrary party (1). These were Slingsby Bethel, and Henry Cornish, who took care to qualify themselves by receiving the Sacrament in the Church of England, abjuring the Covenant, and doing every thing as appointed by Act of Parliament. While this election was depending, it was pretended, that Bethel's party had committed some violence against the other, which obliged the King to order a Commission of Oyer and Terminer to be issued out for the trial of the riot. Mean while, the two Sheriffs, contrary to the King, being chosen, Thomas Papillon Esq; presented an address to the Lord-Mayor, in the name of the city, wherein, after disowning all tumultuous and disorderly proceedings, and testifying an inviolable fidelity to the King, they desired his Lordship, That he would, in their names, humbly beseech his Majesty, that the Parliament might speedily assemble. Whether the address produced any effect, or the King had already taken his resolution, a few days after, it was made known by a publick proclamation, that the Parliament should sit on the 21st of October.

While the time of the meeting of the Parliament was yet remote and uncertain, the Court-party had some advantage, but, as it approached, the Country-party gained the superiority. The Duke of Monmouth was returned from Hol-land without leave (2), and instead of going to Court, made several progresses in the Kingdom to encourage his friends, and increase their number. This party were resolved to run all hazards, and ruin themselves or the Duke of York, the next session of Parliament. To this end, the Earl of Shaftsbury, attended by twelve Lords and Gentle-men of note, went publicly to Westminster-Hall, and at the King's Bench-Bar, by a Bill in form, presented the Duke of York as a popish Recusant (3). The thing was but too true, and the whole Kingdom was sensible of it. But till this time no man had dared to take such a step, which was considered as a formal design to break all measures with the Duke. This action so surprized the three principal Ministers, that they concluded the contrary party must necessarily be assured beforehand of the resolutions of the Parliament. Wherefore, to ingratiate the King with the Parliament, they advised him to send the Duke of York into Scotland, believing it would not be in his power to support him, if he left him in England, during the session of the Parliament. The King approving their reasons, obliged the Duke to return to Scotland, after repeated assurances, that he would never forsake him. So the Duke departed the day before the meeting of the Parliament, to the great satisfaction of his enemies, who hoped to ruin him more easily in his absence.

At last, the Parliament met the 21st of October, as the King had promised in his proclamation. In his Speech at the opening, he acquainted both Houses, "That he had made and perfected an alliance with the Crown of Spain, suitable to that which he had before with the States of the United-Provinces, consisting of mutual obligations of succour and defence. He assured them, that nothing should be wanting on his part to give them the fullest satisfaction their hearts could wish, for the security of the Protestant Religion, consistent with preserving the succession of the Crown in its due and legal course of descent. In order to this, he recommended to them to pursue the further examination of the plot, with a strict and impartial enquiry; neither thinking himself nor them safe till that matter was gone through with, and therefore it would be necessary that the Lords in the Tower should be brought to their speedy trial, that justice might be done.—He told them, it would be impossible without their support to preserve Tangier, and therefore desired their advice and assistance.—In conclusion, he recommended to them a perfect union with himself, and one another, as the only thing which could restore the Kingdom to its antient strength and vigour, and raise it up again to that consideration which England had usually had."

During this whole reign, the King's Religion was so great a secret, that very few were acquainted with it. And therefore the King more boldly protested his zeal for the

(3) They that opposed the Bill were the Earls of Huntingdon and Shaftsbury; the Lords Grey of Wilk, Brando, Gerard, Russell and Cavendish; Sir Gilbert Gerard, Sir Edward Herbert, Sir Strong Bro, Sir William Cooper, Sir Thomas Wharton, John Trevor, Thomas Wynne, and William Fort-riber, Esquires. Protestant Religion, and on all occasions declared, he would maintain it against the attempts of the Papists. These protestations might then have some effect, since it is very natural for a King to favour his own Religion. But since it has been certainly known, that Charles II. was a Papist, had abjured the Protestant Religion before his Restoration, and professed, though secretly, the popish Religion, these so solemn and so frequent protestations must be thought very strange, being intended only to deceive his Subjects.

After the Speaker (1) was chosen, and approved by the King, the House of Commons immediately discovered what was to be expected from them, by expelling some of their members, for having been Abhorers. But not content with punishing their own members, they ordered an address to be presented to the King, to remove from all public offices Sir George Jeffries Serjeant at Law, Recorder of London, and Chief-Justice of Chester, as guilty of the same crime, and a betrayer of the rights of the Subject.

As this was a new Parliament, and as the affair of the plot was to be resumed at the King's own desire, the witnesses who had already deposed, laid before the House their Informations, and were joined by Dangerfield, Jennison, Dugdale, and one Turberville, a new evidence. Some likewise came from Ireland. Upon a report made to the House, that Dr. Tonge, who had first discovered the plot to the King, had received no gratuity, he was now recommended to his Majesty for the first good ecclesiastical preferment that fell in his gift. But the Doctor was disappointed of the benefit of this recommendation, by leaving the world not long after. The King on this occasion discovered no less zeal than the Commons, and issued out a proclamation, with a promise of his pardon to any person who should, within two months, give farther information and evidence concerning the horrid and execrable Popish Plot.

But this diffimulation was not capable of deceiving the Commons. Five days after the opening of the Parliament, the 26th of October, the Lord Russel moved, That they might in the first place take into consideration how to suppress Popery, and prevent a Popish Successor. He was seconded by Sir Henry Capel, brother to the Earl of Essex, who, in a long speech, related what had been done to the prejudice of the Kingdom during the present reign. He ascribed the whole to Popish counsels. He spoke of the first Dutch war; of the division of the fleet; of the affair of Chatham; of the fire of London; of the discharge of the prisoners concerned in that wicked act, without trial; of the violation of the Triple League; of the seizing the Dutch Smyrna fleet before war was proclaimed; of the second Dutch war; of the permission to the Irish Papists to wear arms; of the alteration of the Government of Scotland, by lodging it in a commissioner and a council, besides an army of twenty thousand men. He said, the Papists were emboldened to act any thing, by the hopes of having the Duke of York for King: That they were moreover encouraged by the French Ambassador, who by his frequency at Court, seemed to be rather one of the family, and of the King's household, than a foreign Ambassador; and by his free recourse to his Majesty, rather a prime Minister of State of this Kingdom, than a counsellor to another Prince: That since all these irregularities and enormities proceeded from the Popish party, supported by the Duke of York, it was high time to think of some effectual expedient to prevent Popery and a Popish successor.

Several other members spoke to the same effect, some more, some less; and no man offered to vindicate the Duke, or speak in his behalf, till the House came to the two following resolves, upon the 2d of November.

1. That the Duke of York's being a Papist, and the hopes of his coming such to the Crown, hath given the greatest countenance and encouragement to the present designs and conspiracies against the King and the Protestant Religion.
2. That in defence of the King's person and Government, and Protestant Religion, this House doth declare, that they will stand by his Majesty with their lives and fortunes, and that if his Majesty should come to any violent death, which God forbid, they will revenge it to the utmost of their power on the Papists.

Upon these two votes, the Lord Russel moved for a Committee to bring in a Bill to disable the Duke of York from inheriting the Crown. This affair was now debated with great spirit in several eloquent Speeches on both sides the question. The substance of what was urged for the Bill was, that all the evils which the Kingdom had felt, and still laboured under, proceeded from Popish Counsels, begun and headed by the Duke of York. That the danger must be extreme, should he ever enjoy the Crown. That it might be read in Scripture, That one man ought to dye for a nation, but not that three nations should dye for one man. The opposers of the Bill offered not to show there was no danger in a Popish King. This they were willing to suppose, but pretended that there were other expedients to prevent this danger than that of exclusion. That besides, it could not be expected that the Duke of York, and many others, would submit to this Law, the consequence whereof would be a civil war, in which the Duke of York would be supported by all the Princes of Europe.

To this objection it was answered, that no expedient could be thought of to secure the Protestant Religion under a Popish Prince, who would have a Popish Council, Popish Judges, Popish Magistrates, and Deputy-Lieutenants, Popish Commanders at sea and land, nay and Popish Bishops too. That the excluding the Duke from the succession, was no depriving him of his right to the Crown, of which he had rendered himself incapable, by embracing a Religion contrary to that of the Kingdom. For a Popish King and Protestant Subjects were irreconcilable.

The others replied, there was no Law which, for a difference of opinion in Religion, deprived any man of his right.

In conclusion, it was resolved, That a Bill be brought in to disable the Duke of York to inherit the Imperial Crown of this Realm.

Hitherto the Court-party had only skirmished, as I may say, in hopes that an engagement might be avoided. But when this vote had passed, and the Bill was read the first time, Sir Leoline Jenkins Secretary of State, stood up and argued directly against it, by alleging:

1. That it was contrary to natural justice, to condemn any man before the conviction, or the hearing of him.
2. It was contrary to the principles of our Religion, to dispossess a man of his right, because he differs in point of faith.
3. He was of opinion, that the Kings of England had their right from God alone, and that no power on earth could deprive them of it.
4. It was against the oath of Allegiance, taken in its own sense, without Jesuitical evasions; which binding all persons to the King, his heirs, and successors, the Duke, as presumptive heir, must be understood.

The advocates for the Bill answered to the first objection, that not only the Duke of York's interests were concerned, but those of the whole Kingdom; and that if the Duke of York had withdrawn at the time the Parliament was going to meet, his absence ought not to prevent their providing for the good of the Kingdom. To the second objection it was answered, that in establishing for principle, that difference of opinion in Religion ought to be no cause for dispossessing any man of his right, all the Acts of Parliament made since the Reformation against Papists and Sectaries were condemned, who, as Subjects, had rights in common with the rest, of which nevertheless it was thought expedient to deprive them, on account of the dangers to which the Kingdom would be exposed, if they were left in the enjoyment of them. That this was a maxim generally received in all States, Protestant or Popish. That it was very true, the Subjects of a different Religion might be injured by being deprived of their rights; but that this injury proceeded not from the Government's having no right to take this precaution, but from taking it unreasonably and groundlessly, through prejudice, pride, passion, revenge and hatred. To the third objection it was answered, That allowing the principle, that the Kings of England had their right from God alone, it should at least have been specified wherein consisted this Right, and it would never be proved, that the Kings of England were invested with power from God, to alter the Constitution, or introduce a new Religion at pleasure. But, if by this Right was understood only that of the Succession, the principle was false, as might be proved by many instances in the English succession; for all the Kings and Queens since Henry VII. mounted the throne by virtue of an Act of Parliament, which had settled the succession upon the posterity of that Prince, and had since been confirmed by others. It was replied to the fourth objection, that the oath of Allegiance, which bound the Subject to the King's heirs and successors, was to be understood, when those heirs and successors were on the throne, and not while they were yet Subjects. But supposing even the oath to be meant of an engagement to acknowledge for King the next heir, it certainly became void, if that heir rendered himself incapable of succeeding by his ill conduct. That the laws which imposed oaths had always in view a certain constitution of Government, which they supposed constant and unalterable, because all cases that might happen could not be foreseen. But that it could not be denied, there were possible cases in which these

And if in that case it was pretended, the Subject was still bound by his oath of Allegiance to this successor, the plain meaning of the oath would be, that the Subjects bound themselves to slavery, whenever the Prince should think fit to impose it, which was absurd. In fine, that the Parliament was the sole judge of such cases.

Several other reasons alleged for the Bill.

But the advocates for the Bill, not contented with replying to Jenkins's objections, added likewise other reasons to demonstrate the legality, the expedience, the necessity, of the exclusion of the Duke of York. They proved the first point by precedents taken from the History of England, by which they demonstrated, that, on several occasions, the Parliament had really disposed of the Crown in a different manner from the usual custom. Edward III. was acknowledged King in his father's life-time, and Henry IV. while Richard II. was still living. The Parliament moreover granted the Crown to Henry IV., and settled the succession in his posterity, contrary to the known and natural right of the Earl of March, who was next heir to Richard II. Then they settled the Crown upon the Duke of York, and his posterity, after the death of Henry VI., though Henry had a legitimate son living. After the House of York had enjoyed the Crown for three successive reigns, though that House had a numerous issue, the Parliament transferred the Crown to Henry VII. and his posterity. They gave a power to Henry VIII. to name his successors, and settle the succession as he should think proper. Lastly, on the succession of James I. to the Crown, though no Act was demanded by him to confirm his Right, the Parliament however made one, in order not to lose their own. As to the objection, that these Princes were possessed of the Crown when these Acts were made, it ought to be observed, that though they had the power in their hands, and were in possession, they thought fit to demand the Parliament's confirmation, as a thing absolutely necessary to justify their right. In fine, it was impossible for the Parliament, considered as consisting of King, Lords, and Commons, to act any thing contrary to the laws, since their power of repealing old, and enacting new, Laws, could not be disputed. That the supreme and absolute authority resides in the Parliament composed of King, and both Houses. For what is the Parliament but a body consisting of all the members of the State, to which no power on earth hath a right to prescribe? To say therefore, that the Parliament can act unjustly against the laws, is to say, that all the members of the same body may act unjustly to themselves, and be responsible for this injustice, which is an absurdity not to be defended.

As to the fitness and benefit of this Bill, it was not necessary to use many arguments to show, that it was expedient and fit, that the Government and Religion should be secured, and the people delivered from their fears and suspicions. It could not even be denied, that the exclusion of the Duke of York would be attended with these advantages. But as it could not be supposed, that the Duke of York and his adherents, would submit to this Bill, which might occasion a civil war, wherein the Duke might be supported by foreign aid; to this objection it was answered, that it was better to hazard such a war, than be exposed to a more certain danger, namely, of seeing the Laws and Religion invaded by a popish Prince.

But it was principally to demonstrate the necessity of the Exclusion Bill, that the advocates for it displayed all their wit and eloquence. They maintained, that all precautions to limit the power of a popish Prince, would be fruitless, because his promises and oaths could not be relied on, from which the Pope, through a motive of Religion, could absolve him. That before the Reformation, the reign of Henry VII. furnished very remarkable instances, and it did not appear, that Popes, since the Reformation, had relinquished their principles. That, besides, the Duke of York's zeal for his Religion, and his principles concerning the Government, were well known, since the letters of his Secretary, and his intimate union with France, had clearly shown, he was not only disposed to undertake any thing to support the interests of his Religion, but had even, for that end, engaged in measures very prejudicial to the State. That it was to popish counsels, and to the Duke in particular, that the two Dutch wars, so contrary to the interests of England, were to be ascribed. That to him were owing the non-execution of the laws made against popish Recusants, the pernicious designs of the Cabal, and that Coleman's letters made it as clear as the sun, that he was the chief author of the frequent adjournments and prorogations of the Parliament, at the very time they were employed in seeking out expedients to save Europe, and the Protestant Religion from certain ruin. Other arguments were also alleged to prove, that all the precautions which could be taken, would be to no purpose, when the Duke should be on the throne. First, it was said, that his union with France would supply him with money, without his being obliged to apply to the Parliament. That he might thereby maintain what forces he pleased, and having an army at his command, would be master of the Kingdom, and free to perform or not perform the conditions on which he should be raised to the throne. That with this army he might influence the Elections, and procure such a Parliament as would subvert all possible precautions. That there was too much reason to believe, that the late army had been raised with this design, since, being certain, that it was not intended against France, it could only be designed against the Subjects. Nay, it was likely, this was the intent of the expedient proposed, that when the King should happen to die, the Parliament then in being, or the last that was in being, should assemble and sit a competent time, without any new summons or elections, so that after the expiration of this competent time, the Kingdom would fall into the inconvenience just mentioned. That if the transactions since the King's Restoration were considered, it would be found, that nothing had been done with relation to the Government, but what tended to subvert it, and introduce Popery. That the Duke of York's influence in the King's counsels was well known: That though he was absent, his adherents and creatures enjoyed the principal places in the Court and Kingdom, and that from him proceeded all the evils wherewith England was afflicted, and all the dangers the nation had to fear. That if after so manifest a discovery of his designs, after the last testimony of Bedloe on his death-bed, after all the evidence of an execrable plot against the State and Religion, the Duke's sincerity and flattering promises were to be trusted, the consequence would be, a too late and fruitless repentance. From these reasons, and many others, it was inferred, that the Exclusion-Bill was absolutely necessary, and that the people justly expected from their Representatives this extraordinary precaution, to free them from their fears.

The Court-party were extremely embarrassed. There were facts alleged against the Duke which could not be answered, and there were others which they durst not directly deny, for fear of farther disputes, at a time when the torrent ran so high against the Duke. Nay, very few ventured to appear openly for him. Amongst these were Sir Leoline Jenkins Secretary of State, Mr. Hyde a Privy-Counsellor, and one of the three who then managed the Duke's affairs, Mr. Seymour, and one more, Sir Lesline Jenkins desired the House to consider, "That the Duke of York was the King's brother, and Son of Charles I., for whose memory the nation had a great veneration: That the Duke was enriched with excellent endowments, which he had employed in the service of the nation, by fighting their battles, and defending them from the oppression of their enemies, and was only guilty of this one crime, which he hoped, upon a mature deliberation, would not deserve so great a condemnation.—He remembered them, that there were Laws already for the punishment of the crimes he was accused of, and therefore humbly conceived, they ought not to chastise him, by making a new Law before any hearing." Mr. Hyde added—"I do not know that any of the King's murderers were condemned without being heard; and must we deal thus with the brother of our King?—It would consist much better with the justice of the House, to impeach him, and try him, in a formal way, and then cut off his head, if he deserve it. I will not, continued he, dispute the power of Parliaments; but I question whether this Law, if made, would be good in itself.—For ought I know, when you have made this Law, it may have a flaw in it; if not, I am confident there are a loyal party, which will never obey, but will think themselves bound by their oath of allegiance and duty, to pay obedience to the Duke, if ever he should come to be King, which must occasion a civil War."

In the course of the debates on this Bill, Sir Francis Winnington alledged, "That an Act of the thirteenth of Elizabeth made it treason for any man to say, that the Parliament could not alter the succession." To which Mr. Finch replied, I will not say that Acts of Parliament cannot dispose of the succession, because it was made treason by a Statute in the 13th of Elizabeth. But I will deny that the Kings of England rule by virtue of any Statute Law, as was suggested; for their right is by so ancient a prescription, as that it may justly be said to be from God alone, and that no power on earth ought to dispute it.

Though this question was only accidentally raised and carried no farther, I think it ought not to pass unregarded, because it serves to discover the two opinions among the English, concerning the succession. Some believe, that in extraordinary cases the Parliament has power to dispose of the succession, because the Parliament is supposed to include the

Debates,

At last, after several day debates, the Exclusion-Bill passed the House by a great majority. This Bill was much the same with the other brought in during the last Parliament, only it had this additional clause, "That, after the first of June, Divine Service shall be performed in charge at every Cathedral, Parish-church, and Chapel, openly in every Cathedral, Parish-church and Chapel, twice every year immediately after Divine Service, that is to say, on the 25th of December, and upon Easter-day."

from the King.

While the Commons were proceeding on this Bill, the King endeavoured to interrupt their debates by two messages. By the first he desired them to expedite such matters as were necessary for the service of the Crown, and the Plot. Assuring them, that all remedies they could tender to him, conducing to these ends, should be very acceptable to him, provided they were such as might consist with preserving the succession of the Crown in the legal course of descent.

Upon this message an Address was presented to the King by the House, in which they said, "That though the time of their sitting had not much exceeded a fortnight, yet they had in that time not only made a considerable progress in some things absolutely necessary for the safety of his Majesty's person, the effectual suppression of Popery, and the security of the Religion, Lives, and Estates, of his Majesty's Protestant Subjects; but even in relation to the trials of the five Lords impeached in Parliament, they had so far proceeded, as they should in a short time be ready for the same. But they could not (without being unfaithful to his Majesty and their Country) omit humbly to inform his Majesty, that their difficulties, even as to those trials, were much increased, by the evil and destructive counsels of those persons who advised his Majesty, first to the prorogation, and then to the dissolution of the last Parliament, at a time when the Commons were prepared for those trials; as likewise by the many and long prorogations of the present Parliament, before the same was permitted to sit. That a principal evidence was unfortunately dead, between the calling and the sitting of the Parliament. That others had been taken off, or discouraged from giving their evidence. To prevent the like inconveniences for the future, they made it their humble request to his Majesty, that he would not suffer himself to be prevailed upon by the like counsels, to do any thing which might occasion either the deferring a full discovery of the plot, or the suspending the trial of the persons concerned in it, and thought to speedily and exemplarily justice and punishment."

The King's other message was concerning Tangier, to resign it to the King of Morocco, in lieu of that place. But the House not being disposed to content the King, instead of offering him money for the relief of Tangier, besieged by the King of Morocco, took occasion from this message to propose a bill for the relief of the subjects in this reign. It was argued, "That they were indeed afraid of Tangier, but more afraid of a popish success:—they were unwilling to give any money, because they remembered, when eleven hundred thousand pounds was given for the building of ships, not one ship was built; and above two millions given to support the Triple-league, when it was soon employed for the breaking of it; and twelve hundred thousand pounds given for a war with France, which ended in nothing, but in a more private obligation for peace." These were facts to which the friends of the Court had nothing to reply, because they were publicly known. They contented themselves with demonstrating the importance of Tangier to the Levant trade, and representing, that the two millions expended on the Mole would be entirely lost. In short, as the Commons had always in mind the Exclusion-Bill, they took occasion from this message to preface to the King a long address, or rather remonstrance, setting forth, in eighteen articles, the dangerous state of the Kingdom, with regard to Popery. But it was not so much to acquaint the King with these dangers, as to represent them to the people, so that they might think the Exclusion-Bill less strange. The substance of these eighteen articles was as follows :

“ 1. That Tangier had been several times under the “ command of popish Governors; that the supplies sent “ thither, had been in great part made up of popish officers “ and soldiers, and that the Irish Papists had been not “ countenanced and encouraged.

“ 2. That here at home the endeavours and attempts of “ the popish party had been so bold and successful, that it “ was a matter of admiration to them, and which they “ could only ascribe to an over-ruling providence, that his “ Majesty's reign was still continued over them, and that “ they were yet assembled to consult the means of their “ preservation.

“ 3. That this bloody and reflcls party had found coun“ tenance and protection from the laws made against them :
“ That they had found means to disgrace their oppofers ;
“ and if they were Judges, Juftices of the peace, or other “ Magiftrates, to have them turned out of commiffion :
“ So that after fome time, they became able to influence “ matters of State and Government ; and thereby to de“ froy thofe that they could not corrupt.

“ 4. The continuance and prorogation of Parliaments, “ had been accommodated to serve the purposes of that “ party.

“ 5. Money raised upon the people to supply his Ma“ jesty's extraordinary occasions, had, by the prevalence “ of popish counsels, been employed to make war upon a “ Protestant State, and to advance and augment the dread“ ful power of the French King.

“ 6. That great numbers of his Majesty's Subjects were “ sent into, and continued in the service of that King :
“ And even the Ministers of England were made instru“ ments, to persuade the States of Holland to accept of a de“ mand from the French King, of admitting the publick “ exercise of the Roman Catholick Religion.

“ 7. That if ever any command were given for those “ laws to be put in execution against Papists, even from “ thence they gained advantage to their party, while the “ edge of those laws was turned against Protestant Dissen“ ters, and the Papists escaped in a manner untouched.

“ 8. That the Test-Act had little effect; for the Papists, “ either by dispensations obtained from Rome, submitted “ to those Tests, and held their offices themselves; or those “ put in their places were so favourable to their interests, “ that Popery it self had rather gained than lost ground “ since that Act.

" 9. That a Popish Secretary, since executed for his " treasons, had maintained a correspondence at Rome, and " in the Courts of other foreign Princes, For the subduing
" (to use their own words) That pestilential heresy which had so long domineered over this northern world.

“ 10. That out of these counsels and correspondencies, “ was hatched that damnable and hellish Plot, by the “ good Providence of God brought to light about two years “ since.

“ 11. That when this accursed conspiracy was first “ discovered, the Papists began to smother it, with the “ barbarous murder of a Justice of the Peace, within one “ of his Majesty's own palaces.

" 12. That amidst these distractions and fears, Popish " officers for the command of forces were allowed upon " the musters, upon special orders countersigned by a Secre" tary of State: And in like manner, above fifty new com" missions were granted about the same time to known
" Papists,

“ 13. That when, in the next Parliament, the House of Commons were prepared to bring to a legal trial the principal conspirators in this plot, that Parliament was first prorogued, and then dissolved: And the interval between the calling and fitting of this Parliament had been so long, that the Papists had gained time and advantage of covering their past crimes, and practising them more effectually.

“ 14. That witnesses had been corrupted, not only by “ promises of reward, but of the favour of his Majesty's “ brother.

" 15. That divers of the most considerable of his Majesty's Protestant Subjects had crimes of the highest nature forged against them, the charge to be supported by subornation and perjury, that to wit, by the said James and James forms of law and justice.

“ 16. That a presentment being prepared for the Grand-“ Jury of Middlesex, against the Duke of York, the Grand-“ Jury were, in an unprecedented and illegal manner, dis“ charged; and that with so much haste and fear, lest

" 17. That because a pamphlet came out weekly, called " The Weekly Packet of Advice from Rome, exposing " Popery,

1680. "Popery, as ridiculous, to the People, as it deserved, a new and arbitrary rule of Court, was made in the King's Bench, (rather like a Star Chamber than a Court of Law) that the same should not for the future be printed by any person whatsoever.

"18. That notwithstanding all the proclamations for the banishing Papists from about this great city, and residence from his Majesty's Court, and the Parliament; yet great numbers of them, and that of the most dangerous sort, did daily resort hither, and abide here."

"For all which reasons, the Commons entreated his Majesty, that none but persons of sincere affection to the Protestant Religion, might be put into any employment civil or military, that whilst they gave a supply to Tangier, they might be assured they did not augment the strength of their Popish adversaries, nor increase their own dangers. But that if his Majesty should vouchsafe to grant their desires, they should not only be ready to assist him in defence of Tangier, but do whatsoever else should be in their power to enable him to protect the Protestant Religion and interest at home and abroad."

Two days after this mortifying address, on the 15th of November (1), the Exclusion-Bill was sent up to the House of Lords (2). It passed only by two voices upon the first reading. But on the second reading it was thrown out by a superiority of sixty-three, against thirty. Of fourteen Bishops that day in the House, three only gave their votes for, and eleven against the Bill (3). The King was present at the whole debate, which lasted till near midnight.

It was a great mortification to the Commons, to see their favorite Bill thus thrown out by the Lords. They grew so fullen, and out of humour, that they fell upon several members of their own House, expelling some, and impeaching and imprisoning others, as well as upon persons not of their House (4), for being Abhorers, or for having advised and assisted in drawing up the proclamation against petitioning for the sitting of the Parliament. But this served only to discover their rage at their disappointment concerning the Exclusion-Bill (5).

On the 30th of November, a new scene was opened, namely, the trial of William Howard, Lord Viscount Stafford, one of the five papist Lords in the Tower, who were accused of being concerned in the plot. He was tried before the Lords in Westminster-Hall, the Chancellor being appointed by the King, to perform the office of High-Steward. The managers for the Commons began with the plot in general, and laid open the malice, wickedness, and horreur, of so dreadful, bloody, and hellish a design: They strenuously insisted on the express positive oaths of the witnesses, upon whom the credit of the plot depended: They expatiated on Coleman's letters and others, clearly proving the designs and activity of the writers: They pressed home the execrable murder of Sir Edmundbury Godfrey, charged upon the Papists, as well by the oaths of self-acknowledged partners in the fact, as by a letter sent from London to Tixall, intimating this very murder, the third day after it was committed: They fully displayed the sham plots, and counter-conspiracies, whereby the Papists would have suborned the King's evidence, and turned all the guilt upon his Majesty's loyal Subjects: They urged the firing the City, the burning the Navy, the calling in French armies, swill Irish, Spanish pilgrims, &c. They recapitulated the several trials of Ireland, Whitebread, Langhorn, &c. and alledged the votes of both Houses of Parliament, declaring the plot. To corroborate all which, they repeated the cruelties of Queen Mary, the French and Irish massacres, the powder-plot, &c. And they anatomized the wicked principles and practices of murdering, lying, equivocating, forswearing, faith-breaking, &c. imputed to the Papists, as held by them lawful and meritorious. In fine, they produced witnesses to prove the plot in general, but chiefly three appeared against the accused Lord, namely, Dugdale, Oates, and Turberville.

"1. Dugdale swore, "That at a certain meeting held at Tixall in Staffordshire, about the end of August, or beginning of September 1678, the Lord Stafford, with Lord Aston, and others, did in the presence of the witnesses, give his full consent, to take away the King's life, and introduce the popish Religion. And that on the 20th,

"or 21st of September, in the forenoon, the Lord Stafford sent for the witness to his chamber, while he was dressing; and, turning his servant out, offered him five hundred pounds for his charges and encouragement, to take away the King's life; and further told him, He should have free pardon of all his sins, and be sainted; for the King had been excommunicated, and was likewise a traitor, and a rebel, and an enemy to Jesus Christ.

Oates swore, "That in the year 1678, both in Spain and at St. Omer's, he saw several letters, signed Stafford, wherein his Lordship assured the Jesuits of his fidelity and zeal, in promoting the Catholic cause; that in 1678, being in London, his Lordship came to the chamber of Father Penwick, since executed; and there, in his presence received a commission from him, to be Paymaster-general to the army: Whereupon his Lordship said, He must of necessity go down into the Country to take account how affairs stood there; and did not doubt, but at his return, would do the business. And, speaking of the King, he further added, He hath deceived us a great while, and we can bear no longer."

Turberville gave an account of "disobliging his friends, by leaving his Frier's habit at Dunoy; and thereupon went into France, in the year 1675, where at Paris, getting acquaintance with his Lordship, he proposed to the witness, a way, both to retrieve his reputation with his friends, and make himself happy; and this was by taking away the life of the King of England, who was a heretick, and a rebel against God Almighty. That when he took leave of him, his Lordship appointed to meet him at London; but he soon after returned into France, not being willing to undertake the proposals, and was discountenanced by his friends, and reduced to poverty."

The accused Lord, in his defence, alledged many things to invalidate the credit of the plot, and particularly, the reputation of these three witnesses.

Against Dugdale he produced evidence, "That he was a person of an infamous life; that he had cheated the Lord Aston, his master, and defrauded the workmen and servants of their wages; that by his extravagancies and misdemeanours, he had run himself into several hundred pounds debt, for which he was thrown into goal, and despaired of ever getting out from thence, otherwise than by making the pretended discoveries. In the next place, that he had directly perjured himself, in divers parts and circumstances, as to the time and place, in this and other depositions." And further, he proved, "That he had endeavoured to suborn divers persons to make false oaths, and so to strengthen his own by other men's perjury."

Against Oates he enlarged upon the great improbabilities, "That so many great and rich conspirators, who had trusted him with their greatest secrets, and whose lives were at his mercy, should suffer him to be reduced to such a wretched degree of beggary, as he was acknowledged to be in when he made his first discoveries. He likewise insisted upon his omissions, additions, and contradictions, that plainly appeared in his several depositions about the plot; and also upon his villainous feigning himself to be of another Religion, by solemn renunciations of his faith, and by such sacraments on one side, and such abjurations and execrations on the other, as rendered him unfit to be admitted for an evidence against any man living."

As to Turberville, he urged, "That he was perjured in this, and many other of his depositions; and that his Narrative had many mistakes and blunders in it. He denied that he or any of his servants, ever saw him at Paris; and made some remarks upon his poverty and want, his loose manner of living, his shameful cursing and swearing, and particularly his using these words, God damn me! There is no trade good now, but that of a discoverer."

This defence, as is easily seen, could not well be more weak, and yet it lasted a whole week, and the account of this trial makes a small volume in Folio, containing in substance, only what I have said. The accusations and depositions were express, and the prisoner's defence confided, 1. In an absolute denial of the crime for which he was impeached. But this denial could be of no service to him,

In the House of Lords the Earls of Essex and Shilbushy argued most in it. And the Earl of Halifax (who was for Limitations) was the Champion on the other Side. 1680, as it is not what the Judges go by. 2. In several allegations against the witnesses. But bare allegations without proofs, are not wont to justify the accused. 3. In an improbability alleged against Oates, that if he had been so well acquainted with the secrets of so many rich men, they would never have suffered him to be reduced to such want. To this the Lords doubtless paid the regard, they thought it deserved. But, methinks, such an improbability cannot be said to make a convincing proof in favour of the prisoner. 4. In a witness who deposed, that Dugdale was a person of an infamous life, and guilty of several cheats. On which, I cannot forbear repeating what I said on a like occasion, that if in a plot against the King or the State, only witnesses of honesty and reputation were to be allowed, there would be danger of always wanting evidence, because such plots are commonly discovered by the complacencies, and seldom any but villains are concerned.

However this be, after the Lord Stafford had made a long and pathetic speech, and in the presence of God protested his innocence, he was found guilty by fifty-five votes against thirty-one. The Lord High-Steward asking him, What he could say for himself, why judgment of death should not pass upon him, according to law? He replied, My Lord, I have very little to say; I confess, I am surprized at it, for I did not expect it. But God's will be done; I will not murmur at it. God forgive those that have falsely sworn against me.

Sentence being passed upon him, several of his relations and acquaintance were urgent with him to make discoveries of all he knew, as the only means to save his life; to which he answered, that he was willing, out of a meer sense of duty, without any temporal view, to discover the utmost of what he knew. Whereupon, he was brought to the bar of the Lords, where he declared things known to all the world, but said nothing of what was wished to be known.

He said, "That he thought it no crime for any man to wish his neighbour might be of the same Religion, wherein he himself hoped to be saved; nay, to seek and promote it by such ways as the Laws of God and the nation allow. That there had been, on several occasions, endeavours used to obtain an abrogation, or at least a mitigation of severities against the Catholics; but no otherwise than by legal and parliamentary means. That he himself at Breda propounded a hundred thousand pounds to the King, for the taking off the Penal Laws against them. That a Bill had been brought into the House of Lords in their favour, but was quashed by Chancellor Hyde. That the Earl of Bristol had made some proposals with no better success. That he had offered some proposals to the Duke of York, the Chancellor, and the Earl of Shaftsbury, which last said, He doubted not but that there would come great advantages to the King by it." But this pretended confession not giving satisfaction to the Lords, he was sent back to the Tower.

The 29th of December he was beheaded, being sixty-eight years of age: He protested his innocence to his last moment.

The 15th of December, the King came to the House of Lords, and sending for the Commons, made a Speech to both Houses, which properly was but a repetition of that made at the opening of this session, relating to his alliances with Spain and Holland, for the repose of Christendom, and concerning Tangier. After which he renewed his promise of concurring with them in any remedies for the security of the Protestant Religion, which might consist with preserving the succession of the Crown in its due and legal course of descent.

The Commons returning to their House, instead of taking the King's Speech into consideration, resolved themselves into a grand Committee how to secure the Kingdom against Popery and arbitrary Government. After a warm debate, they resolved:

"That a Bill be brought in immediately, to banish all the considerable Papists out of the Kingdom." And upon a farther debate on the mischiefs and dangers of Popery, they resolved, "That it is the opinion of the Committee, that as long as the Papists have any hopes of the Duke of York's succeeding the King in the Kingdoms of England and Ireland, and dominions thereunto belonging; the King's Person, the Protestant Religion, and the Lives, Liberties, and Properties of all his Majesty's Protestant Subjects, are in apparent danger of being destroyed." Then upon reference made to an Act of Queen Elizabeth, for an association, they came to a like resolution: "That a Bill be brought in for an association of all his Majesty's Protestant Subjects, for the safety of his Majesty's person, the defence of the Protestant Religion, and the preservation of his Majesty's Protestant Subjects, against all invasions and oppositions; and for preventing the Duke of York, or any other Papist, from succeeding to the Crown."

The House stopped not there. After considering of ways and means to secure the Kingdom against Popery and arbitrary Government, they came to these three resolves. 1. That it is the opinion of this House, that a Bill be brought in, For the more effectual securing of the meetings, and sittings of frequent Parliaments. 2. That it is the opinion of the House, that a Bill be brought in, that the Judges may hold their places and salaries, Quam diu se bene gesserint. 3. That it is the opinion of the House, that a Bill be brought in, against illegal exaction of money from the People, to make it High-Treason.

After these resolves, each of which discovered their extreme distrust of the Court, they thought fit to consider the King's Speech. Many severe reflections were made upon the French Ambassador, the French women, the Duke, and his creatures, and indirectly, even upon the King himself. At last, they resolved upon an address to the King, by way of answer to his Speech, in which they represented:

"That this Protestant Kingdom can never be safe, while there is any hopes or expectation of a Popish successor; and they beseech his Majesty, in his great wisdom, to consider, whether, in case the Imperial Crown of this Protestant Kingdom should descend to the Duke of York, the opposition which may possibly be made to his possessing it, may not only endanger the further descent in the royal line, but even monarchy itself? They therefore became humble petitioners to his sacred Majesty, that in tender consideration of his poor Protestant People, his Majesty would be graciously pleased to depart from the reservation in the said Speech; and when a Bill shall be tendered to his Majesty in a parliamentary way, To disabie the Duke of York from inheriting the Crown, his Majesty will give his assent thereto; as also to another Act, whereby his Protestant Subjects may be enabled to associate themselves for the defence of his Majesty's person, the Protestant Religion, and the security of his Kingdom.—And as some farther means for the preservation both of their Religion and Property, they are humble suitors to his Majesty, that from henceforth such persons only may be Judges, as are men of ability, integrity, and known affection to the Protestant Religion, and that they may hold both their offices and salaries, Quam diu se bene gesserint. That no one may bear the office of a Lord-Lieutenant, but who is a person of integrity and known affection to the Protestant Religion. That Deputy-Lieutenants, and Justices of the Peace, may be also so qualified, and men of ability, of estates, and interest in their country. That none may be employed as military officers, but men of known experience, courage, and affection to the Protestant Religion. And these their humble requests being obtained, they shall, on their part, be ready to assist his Majesty for the preservation of Tangier, and for putting his Majesty's fleet into such a condition, as it may preserve his Majesty's sovereignty of the seas, and be for the defence of the nation." The King gave no answer to this address till about a fortnight after.

While the King and the Parliament were united, it was the interest of the Papists to promote a Toleration of the Non-conformists, that they themselves might enjoy the benefit under that general denomination. But since the King and the Parliament were at variance, the persecution fell upon the Papists alone, who were accused of intending to introduce their Religion by force. Wherefore, it was their interest to incense the Church of England against the Presbyterians, and thereby cause a diversion. It cannot be denied, that many of the Bishops and Clergy fell into this snare, and were pleased to see the Court, which always favoured the Papists, inclined to persecute the Presbyterians. Incouraged by the Court, the most zealous of the Episcopal way failed not to discover their hatred of the Presbyterians, so that at the very time, the Papists were accused by the Parliament as the authors of all the mischiefs of the Kingdom, the Presbyterians were attacked, as if it was intended to throw the blame upon them. By this the Clergy of the Church of England were censured for appearing to favour the designs of the Papists. Besides, it is certain, that during the contests between the King and the Parliament, the Clergy in general were attached to the Court, and the interests of the Duke of York. This was sufficient to revive the complaints of the Presbyterians against the Church of England, and to charge her with being Popishly inclined. Moreover, in the disposition of the Court in favour of the Papists, ever since the beginning of this reign, or at least since the Earl of Clarendon's disgrace, it may easily be imagined, that care had been taken to introduce among the Clergy, men of a doubtful Religion, and from whom the court had nothing to fear.

Upon all these accounts, the Commons thought it highly reasonable at this juncture, to screen the Presbyterians from persecution. They found themselves moreover concerned, 1680. in that, for the reason before intimated, there were many Presbyterians in the House, who to qualify themselves for their election, had taken the oaths, and received the Sacrament in the Church of England, but who were not for that the less Presbyterians. So, the 21st of December, a Bill was read the first time, for uniting the King's Protestant Subjects. Whilst the rigid Episcopalians prevailed in the second Parliament of this reign, they had carefully avoided to distinguish the Protestant Nonconformists from the others, because it was advantageous to them, to make them but one body under the same name. But this Parliament which had other views, neglected not to make so natural a distinction. This Bill, which perhaps was too indulgent to the Presbyterians, meeting with strong opposition in the House, was relinquished for one less advantageous, which exempted the Protestant Dissenters from the penalty imposed on the Papists by the Act of the 35th of Elizabeth. This Bill passed both Houses, but was secretly conveyed away, when it was to be offered to the King for his assent (1).

The Commons concluded the year with this vote, "That no member of the House should accept of any office or place of profit from the Crown, without leave of the House; nor any promise of any such office or place of profit during such time as he should continue a member of the House (2)."

The King found himself very much at a loss what answer to return to the Commons address. His council was divided. Some advised him to return no answer, and to use this pretence, that as he had addressed his Speech to both Houses, he could not consider the particular address of one House as an answer to his Speech. Others were of opinion, that the King should return a positive answer, because they little cared to keep any measures with the Parliament, but on the contrary, (knowing their management of the King's affairs, would never be forgiven by the Commons;) they were indirectly doing all they could to engage him to dissolve the Parliament, and call no more for the future. Of this opinion were the four principal directors of the King's affairs, namely, Sunderland, Halifax, Mr. Hyde, and Mr. Godolphin. When it is considered, that from the beginning of this reign, or at least from the Earl of Clarendon's disgrace, there were not only men of these principles always in the Council, but that also they were generally the chief Ministers, it can hardly be doubted, that the King himself was likewise of the same principles, though there should be no other proof. It is therefore certain, that the fears of the Commons were not groundless. It must be farther remarked, that though the Council was divided concerning the manner of answering the Commons address, they were agreed as to the thing itself, not one Privy-Counsellor being of opinion, that the King should not consent to the exclusion of the Duke of York.

Though the King at first seemed to approve of the former of these two opinions, he suffered himself to be influenced by the latter, namely, to return a positive answer to the Commons, which he did in the following manner: "His Majesty received the address of this House, with all the disposition they could wish to comply with their reasonable desires, but upon perusing it, he is sorry to see their thoughts so wholly fixed upon the Bill of Exclusion, as to determine, that all other remedies for the suppressing of Popery, will be ineffectual: His Majesty is confirmed in his opinion against that Bill, by the judgment of the House of Lords, who rejected it. He therefore thinks, there remains nothing more for him to say, in answer to the address of this House, but to recommend to them the consideration of all other means for the preservation of the Protestant Religion, in which they have no reason to doubt of his concurrence, whenever they shall be presented to him in a parliamentary way: And that they would consider the present state of the Kingdom, as well as the condition of Christianity, in such a manner as may enable him to preserve Tangiers, and secure his alliances abroad, and the peace and settlement at home (3)."

This answer was not read in the House till three days after, because the Commons were employed in drawing up an impeachment against Chief-Justice Serjeant, who was accused of endeavouring to stifle the belief of the plot, discouraging the King's evidences, dismissing the Grand-Jury, that should have presented the Duke of York, and of unjustly prosecuting several writers and publishers of Pamphlets. In this interval the Lords sent to the Commons the following vote, "That they declared, and were fully satisfied, that there now was, and for divers years last had been, a horrid and treasonable plot, continued and carried on by the Irish Papists, for mauling the English, and subverting the Protestant Religion, and the ancient established Government of that Kingdom." The Commons readily concurred to this vote, and added, "That the Duke of York's being a Papist, and the expectation of his coming to the Crown, had given the greatest countenance and encouragement thereto, as well as to the horrid Popish Plot in the Kingdom of England."

When the King's answer was read in the House of Commons, it raised great heats and complaints against the Lords, for throwing out the Bill of Exclusion, in compliance to the King, or because they were awed by his presence. At last, after great debates, they came to these three resolutions:

"1. That it is the opinion of this House, that there is no security nor safety for the Protestant Religion, the King's life, or government of this Nation, without passing a Bill for disabling James Duke of York, to inherit the Imperial Crown of this realm, and the dominions and territories thereunto belonging: And to rely upon any other means and remedies, without such a Bill, is not only insufficient but dangerous.

"2. That his Majesty, in his last message, having assured this House, of his readiness to concur in all other means for the preservation of the Protestant Religion, this House doth declare, that until a Bill be likewise passed for excluding the Duke of York, this House cannot give any supply to his Majesty, without danger to his Majesty's person, extreme hazard of the Protestant Religion, and unfaithfulness to those by whom the House is intrusted.

"3. That all persons who advised his Majesty, in his last message to this House, to insist upon an opinion against the Bill for excluding the Duke of York, have given pernicious counsel to his Majesty, and are promoters of Popery, and enemies to the King and Kingdom."

In pursuance of this last vote, the House came to a resolution of presenting to the King, an address, to remove from his person and counsels, George Earl of Halifax, Laurence Hyde Esq; [Henry Somerset] Marquis of Worcester, [Henry Hyde] Earl of Clarendon, and [Lewis Duras] Earl of Feverham. Moreover they voted, That whoever should hereafter lend, or cause to be lent, by way of advance, any money upon the branches of the King's revenue arising by Custom, Excise, or Hearth-money, should be judged a hinderer of the fitting of Parliaments, and be responsible for the same in Parliament.——And that whoever should accept or buy any Tally, or anticipation, upon any part of the King's revenue, should be adjudged as before.

The House of Commons could hardly carry things any further, and seemed to intend to engage the King in some violent action, which might give an advantage against him. Thus had the Parliament of 1640 behaved to Charles I. Duke of York, But Charles II. had one advantage wanted by his father, which was, that he had not, like him, deprived himself of the power to prorogue or dissolve the Parliament, and so could, whenever he pleased, put an end to the mortifications which were given him. It is true, in such a case he must have contented himself with his ordinary revenue, which, to a Prince so prodigal as he, was not easy. It was this which made his enemies hope, he would come at last to their terms, and consent to the Exclusion-Bill. Indeed, if Father Orleans may be credited, the Duchess of Portsmouth threw herself at his feet, and prayed him not to ruin himself for the sake of his brother (4). Fagel, Pensionary of Holland, sent Mr. Sidney, the King's Envoy at the Hague, a Memorial, representing, that the King could not support the Duke of York, without relinquishing the interests of all Europe.

But this argument made no great impression on the King's mind. On the contrary, these difficulties served only to provoke him the more, so that he resolved to prorogue the Parliament. The Commons having private notice of this, assembled more early than usual, and, before

(1) On the Day of the Prorogation, when the Bill for repealing the Act of the 35th of Elizabeth ought to have been offered to the King, the Clerk of the Crown, by the King's particular order, withdrew the said Bill. The King had no mind open to any it: but he had less mind to pass it. So the indifferent method was taken, which was a high offence in the Clerk of the Crown, Burnet, p. 495.

(2) This was said John Wilmer, the witty Earl of Rochester; Samuel Butler Author of Hudibras; Harry Marten, one of the Regicides; and the famous Painter Sir Peter Lely, Richard.

(3) This Answer was brought by Sir William Temple. See his Mem. Part III. p. 352.

(4) The true Reason, according to Burnet, why the Duchess of Portsmouth openly declared for the House of Commons, and was so hearty for the Exclusion, was this: It was proposed to her, that if she could bring the King to the Exclusion, the Parliament would next press the King to declare the succession to the Crown; and as she was absolute Mistress of the King's Spirit, she might reckon the King would be prevailed on to declare her Son his Successor. The Duke of Monmouth, who had the same view, joined with her to carry on the Exclusion; and they thought they were making Tools of one another to serve their own Ends, p. 487.

1680-1. the King came to the House of Lords, the 10th of January, had time to pass the following votes :

Vote of the Commons.

" 1. That whosoever advised his Majesty to prorogue the Parliament, to any other purpose, than in order to passing a Bill for the Exclusion of James Duke of York, is a betrayer of the King, the Protestant Religion, and of the Kingdom of England, a promoter of the French interest, and a pensioner of France

" 2. That it is the opinion of this House, That the Acts of Parliament made in the reign of Queen Elizabeth and King James, against popish Reculants, ought not to be extended against Protestant Dissenters.

" 3. That it is the opinion of this House, That the prosecution of Protestant Dissenters upon the penal Laws, is at this time grievous to the Subject, a weakening the Protestant Interest, an encouragement to Popery, and dangerous to the peace of the Kingdom."

The King presents the Parliament.

These votes were scarce passed, when the King came to the House of Peers, and sending for the Commons, gave the royal assent to two or three Acts of little importance (1); and then, the Chancellor, by his order, prorogued the Parliament to the 20th of January.

Addressed by the City of London.

Three days after, the Lord Mayor and Common-council of London, presented to the King an address, for the sitting of the Parliament on the day appointed, that they might effect the great affairs before them. This address served only to exasperate the King further. Wherefore, by a Proclamation, the 18th of January, he dissolved the Parliament. At the same time he summoned another to meet at Oxford the 21st of March, being offended with the city of London.

The Ministers and Privy-Council, feel in great Difficulties.

During these contests, the Ministers and Privy-counsellors were not a little embarrassed. They saw the House of Commons so attached to the Exclusion-Bill, that nothing else could satisfy them. On the other hand, they knew by experience, that on other important occasions, the King had not shown that firmness which his Ministers could have wished, but had abandoned them, and come into the measures of the Parliament. This made them fear, the same thing might happen on the present occasion, and therefore, [Robert Spencer] Earl of Sunderland, Secretary of State, went off the first, and contrary to the King's express order, voted for the Exclusion-Bill in the House of Lords. The Earls of Essex and Salisbury, Privy-counsellors, did the same, and Sir William Temple sufficiently testified his fear of being expelled to the House of Commons. This conduct of some of the Privy-counsellors, gave the Country-party hopes, that the King would at last comply if he was warmly pressed.

But that party was disappointed in their expectations. For, though the King had discovered no great firmness in all his difficulties, yet in the affair of his brother he was ever immovable (2). Immediately after the dissolution of the Parliament, he removed the Earl of Sunderland from being Secretary, and gave the place to the Earl of Conway. He likewise struck out of the Council-book, the names of the Earls of Essex, Salisbury, Sunderland, and Sir William Temple, and in their room put men whose principles were more agreeable to his own (3). He likewise made some alteration among the Judges. In a word, by the men whom he advanced, he sufficiently discovered his intention to support the Duke of York his brother, let what would be the consequence.

The King reflects on the conduct of the Ministers.

On the other hand, the contrary party to the Court were not idle. The Magistracy and Common council of London, being of that party, hastened the elections of members to serve in the ensuing Parliament, and on the 4th of February, rechose their old members (4). The election was no sooner over, than the new Representatives were presented with a paper, in the name of the Citizens of London then assembled in Common-Hall, containing a "return of their most hearty thanks for their faithful and unwearied endeavours in the two last Parliaments, to search into and discover the depth of the Popish Plot; to preserve his Majesty's royal person, the Protestant Religion, and the well established Government of this realm; to secure the meeting and sitting of frequent Parliaments; to assert their undoubted rights of petitioning, and to punish such as have betrayed those rights; to promote the long-wished for union of his Majesty's Protestant Subjects; to repeal the thirty-fifth of Elizabeth, and the Corporation Act; and more especially for their assiduous endeavours in promoting the Bill of Exclusion of James Duke of York." In fine, they concluded, "That being confidently assured, that they, [the said members for the city,] will never consent to the granting any money-supply, till they have effectually secured them against Popery and Arbitrary Power, they resolved, by God's assistance, to stand by their said members with their lives and fortunes." The example of London was followed by most places in the Kingdom, and not only the old members were re-elected (5), but papers of addresses, like that of London, were presented to them. So, when the elections were over, the King with grief saw, he was going to meet the same Parliament he had dissolved.

Mean while, the King's precaution to call his new Parliament at Oxford, gave great uneasiness to the Country-party. They were desirous that the Parliament should sit at Westminster, where they were sure of the assistance of the Londoners in case of need. And who knows, whether some did not propose to use, for passing the Exclusion Bill in the House of Lords, the same means formerly used to extort from the Peers their consent to the Bill of Attainder against the Earl of Stafford? Be this as it will, they resolved to use their utmost endeavours to have the place altered, and the Parliament removed to Westminster. For this purpose, the Earl of Essex, attended by fifteen Lord (6), delivered a petition to the King, introducing it with the following speech :

May it please your Majesty,

THE Lords here present, together with divers of your Peers of the realm, taking notice, that by your late proclamation, your Majesty had declared an intention of calling a Parliament at Oxford; and observing from History and Records, how unfortunate many assemblies have been, when called at a place remote from the capital city; as particularly the Congress in Henry the Second's time at Clarendon; three several Parliaments at Oxford in Henry the Third's time, and at Coventry in Henry the Sixth's time; with divers others which have proved very fatal to those Kings, and have been followed with great mischief on the whole Kingdom: And considering the present posture of affairs, the many jealousies and discontents which are amongst the people, we have great cause to apprehend, that the consequences of a Parliament now at Oxford, may be as fatal to your Majesty and the nation, as those others mentioned have been to the then reigning Kings. And therefore we do conceive, that we cannot answer it to God, to your Majesty, or to the People, if we, being Peers of the realm, should not, on so important an occasion, humbly offer our advice to your Majesty; that, if possible, your Majesty may be prevailed with to alter this, [as we apprehend] unreasonable resolution. The grounds and reasons of our opinion are contained in this our petition, which we humbly present to your Majesty.

The petition contained in substance, an enumeration of the mischiefs attending the many late adjournments, prorogations, and dissolutions of Parliaments, at a time when his Majesty's person, and the whole nation were in such imminent danger from the Papists. "And now his Majesty had been prevailed to call another Parliament at Oxford, where neither Lords nor Commons could be in safety, but daily would be exposed to the sword of the Papists, and their adherents, of whom too many have crept into his Majesty's Guards: The liberty of speaking according to their consciences, would be thereby destroyed, and the validity of their Acts and proceedings left disputable: The straitness of the place no ways admitted of such a concourse of persons, as now followed every Parliament; and the witnesses which were necessary to give evidence upon the Commons impeachment, were unable to bear the charges of such a journey, and unwilling to trust themselves under the protection of a Parliament, that was it felt evidently under the power of Guards and Soldiers. In conclusion, they prayed, that the Parliament might, as usually, sit at Westminster,

The Dukes of Portsmouth and others persuaded him to waive the Duke of York's right, and accept of an Act of Parliament in his own favour, like that made in the reign of Henry VIII. by which he should have a Power vested in him to dispose of the Crown at his Death, under such restrictions and limitations as should be agreed on. Whether such Act was really intended is hard to determine; but it is certain (such an offer was made to the King, with a promise of a considerable sum of Money, towards the supplying his pressing wants. It is likewise certain, that King Charles seemed willing to accept of it, till the French Court, while Interest it was to support the Duke of York, struck up a bargain with the King, to give him more Money for refusing, than had been offered him for consenting to the bill of Exclusion. 1680-1. "where they might consult and act with safety and freedom."

To this address the King returned no answer, but contented himself with frowning upon the Lords who presented it.

All this while the two parties were skirmishing in a hot, or rather so violent a manner, with their pens, that no measures were kept. Libels swarmed with impunity. Some pretend, this was a Court-artifice, to prevent the union of the Protestants, and that ill-language thrown out against the King and the Duke of York, was patiently suffered, in order to cast the blame on the Presbyterians, and give the Episcopal Party occasion to return the imputation of being too much attached to the Court. Thus much is certain, this division, which was carefully fomented, turned to the King's advantage, as will hereafter appear. I shall relate upon this subject an affair which then made a great noise.

One Fitz-Harris an Irish Papist, who had free access to the Dukes of Portsmouth, and kept a correspondence with her favorite-woman Mrs. Wall, and with the Conislier of the French Ambassador, having received several presents, and particularly one of two hundred and fifty guineas, undertook to prevail with one Edmund Everard, to write a libel against the King. Everard feigned to consent, and appointed a meeting to receive informations, by which his pamphlet was to be framed. But at the same time he communicated the affair to Sir William Waller, and Mr. Smith, and caused them to be concealed in a place where they might hear what passed between Fitz-Harris and him. The next day, being both together in a room, Fitz-Harris told Everard, that he should write a libel against the King upon the following heads.

That the King and Royal Family were Papists, and arbitrarily affected from the beginning.

That Charles I. had a hand in the Irish Rebellion, and that Charles II. did countenance the same, by preferring Fitz-Gerald, Fitz-Patrick, and Mount Garret, who were engaged in the said rebellion.

That the AG, forbidding to call the King a Papist, was to stop men's mouths when he should incline to further Popery; which appeared by his adhering so closely to the Duke of York's interest, and hindering him from being proceeded against by the Parliament, and hindering the officers put in by the Duke, to be turned out; and for that the Privy-councillors and Justices of the Peace, who were for the Protestant interest, were turned out of all places of trust.

That it was as much in the power of the people to depose a popish possessor, as a popish successor; and seeing there was no hopes that the Parliament, when they met at Oxford, could do any good, the people were bound to provide for themselves.

Everard afterwards received these instructions in writing, and drew up his libel, which was injurious to the King, and full of edition (1). This libel was to be dispersed by the Penny-Post, to the Protestant Lords, and particularly to the leading Presbyterians, whose houses were to be searched in order to find this libel, which was to serve as a proof of a conspiracy formed by the Presbyterians against the Government. This is what Everard affirmed, and that the whole came from the Court. At last, Waller having informed the King of the affair, the King ordered Secretary Jenkins to issue out a warrant for apprehending Fitz-Harris, and that Waller should execute it. Yet he was no sooner gone, but Sir William declared, he was informed by two worthy Gentlemen, that the King was highly offended with him, saying, he had broken all his measures. However, Waller arrested Fitz-Harris, and sent him to Newgate (2).

Here, as in the former affair concerning the plot, it is pretended, that Fitz-Harris was gained by promises or threats, to depose what has been seen (3). But before this affair could be fully discovered, Fitz-Harris was taken out of Newgate, and sent to the Tower by the King's express order. I shall enter no farther into the particulars of this affair, but content myself with briefly saying, that shortly after the dissolution of the Oxford Parliament, when the Court began to fail with a prosperous gale, without being controlled by the Parliament, Fitz-Harris was brought to his trial; that the Dukes of Portsmouth owned he had given him money, but merely out of charity; that Fitz-Harris continually insinuated, that what he did was by the order of his superiors, and that, after his death, his Wife constantly affirmed that the libel was a Court-trick. In short, he was condemned and executed, whilst the publick could not conceive for what reason an Irish Papist had published a libel against the King, if it was not an artifice of the Court. This affair began in February, and the last Parliament had taken cognizance of it, so that the Commons had ordered an impeachment against him, and when he was sent to the Tower, declared, that for any inferior Court to proceed against him, or any other Person lying under an impeachment of Parliament, is a high breach of the privilege of Parliament. He was nevertheless tried, condemned and executed, to the great disappointment of the Whigs, who hoped, by his means, to discover the artifices of the Court. But the King and his party thought it for their advantage to be rid of a man, who might throw them into difficulties. He was not executed till June, after the dissolution of the Oxford Parliament.

The meeting of this Parliament was universally expected with the utmost impatience, and by the King, with great uneasiness, foreseeing the storm that was gathering. He repaired to Oxford seven or eight days before the opening, and as the suspicions and fears of the Whig party were then at the utmost height, it was thought, the King went so soon to Oxford, on purpose to take measures beforehand, for rendering himself master of the Parliament. Accordingly, the members manifestly shewed their fears of some violence, by going thither attended with armed retinues. Those for the City of London in particular came with a numerous body of well-armed Horle, having ribbands in their hats, with these words woven in them, No POPERY! No SLAVERY! The Parliament meeting the 21st of March, the King made the following Speech to both Houses (4).

My Lords and Gentlemen,
THE unwarrantable proceedings of the last House of Commons, were the occasion of my parting with the last Parliament; for I, who will never use arbitrary Government myself, am resolved not to suffer it in others. I am unwilling to mention particulars, because I am desirous to forget faults; but whatsoever shall calmly consider what offers I have formerly made, and what assurances I renewed to the last Parliament; how I recommended nothing so much to them as the alliances I had made, for the preservation of the general peace in Christendom, and the further examination of the Popish Plot, and how I desired their advice and assistance concerning the preservation of Tangier; and shall then reflect upon the strange unsuitable returns made to such propositions, by men that were called together to consult; perhaps may wonder more, that I had patience so long, than that at last I grew weary of their proceedings. I have thought it necessary to say thus much to you, that I may not have any new occasion given me to remember more of the late miscarriages: It is much my interest, and it shall be as much my care as yours, to preserve the liberty of the Subject; because the Crown can never be safe when that is in danger: And I would have you likewise be convinced, that neither your Liberties nor Properties can subsist long, when the just Rights and Prerogatives of the Crown are invaded, or the honour of the Government brought low, and into dis-reputation.

I let you see, by my calling this Parliament so soon, that no irregularities in Parliaments shall make me out of love with them; and by this means, offer you another opportunity of providing for our security here, by giving that countenance and protection to our neighbours and allies, which you cannot but know they expect from us, and extremely stand in need of at this instant; and at the same time give one evidence more, that I have not neglected my part, to give that general satisfaction and security, which, by the blessing of God, may be attained, if you, on your parts, bring suitable dispositions towards it: And that the just care you ought to have of Religion, be not so managed and improved into unnecessary fears, as to be made a pretence for changing the foundation of the Government. I hope the example of the ill success of former heats, will dispose you to a better temper; and not so much to inveigh against what is past, as to consider what is best to be done in the present conjuncture, the further prosecution of the plot; the

(3) Carroll, one of the Sheriffs of London, going to see him, he desired he would bring him a Justice of the Peace. Carroll went and acquainted the King with it. Whereupon the Secretaries and some Privy Counsellors were sent to examine Fitz-Harris, to whom he gave a long relation of a design to kill the King, in which the Duke of York was concerned, with many other particulars, but it was all a fiction. The Secretaries came to examine him further a second time: He boldly stood to all he had said: and desired that some Justices of the City might be brought to him. So Clayton and Treby came, to whom he made in all points the same pretended discovery over again. So that there was no colour for what was afterwards advanced, namely, that Clayton and Treby had practised on him. Ibid. p. 498.

The House of Commons was refusing the debate about Fitz-Harris, when on a sudden, the Usher of the Black-Rod commanded their attendance in the House of Lords, where they found the King in his robes, who told them.— He perceived there were great heats between the Lords and Commons, and their beginnings had been such as he could expect no good success of this Parliament, and therefore thought fit to dissolve them. Accordingly, the Chancellor declared the Parliament dissolved.

The King, who was prepared beforehand for what he had done, immediately took coach, and drove with all speed to Windor, and the next morning to Whitehall, seeming extremely pleased that he had thus made his escape from the designs of the Commons. This Parliament, which sat but seven days, was the fifth and last of this reign.

From this time, the King, during the rest of his life, governed not only without a Parliament, but with an absolute power. When he saw himself out of the reach of the Parliament, he entirely threw away the mask of dissimulation, and shewed, that the popish plot, the prosecution whereof he had lately recommended to earnestly to the Parliament, appeared to him but a mere chimera, or at least, he did not think it near so dangerous as he would have had it believed. The four Lords, prisoners in the Tower, whom he would have sacrificed to the Parliament, appeared innocent to him. But what was still more remarkable, even to the end of this reign, was, that the King grew as sanguinary, as he had hitherto appeared merciful, and that as soon as he had the power in his hands, he made his enemies feel the most terrible effects of his vengeance. In a word, he clearly discovered by his conduct, that he was entirely in the principles of despotic power, and had only dissembled his sentiments in his speeches to his Parliament, because he judged such dissimulation proper to conduct him to the end proposed to himself, from the first years of his reign.

The Reader must be astonished to see a King, who had received so many mortifications from his Parliaments, who had been so often obliged to comply, and feign opinions he had not, on a sudden become absolute master of his Kingdom, without fleet, without army, without foreign assistance, without money, but that of his ordinary revenue, after many years fruitless labours, to accomplish his designs. It is therefore absolutely necessary to unfold the causes of so surprising a revolution.

By the artifices of the Court, and the natural inclination of many Englishmen, the Kingdom was divided into Whigs and Tories. This division was to be carefully fomented by the Court, and the popish party, that at last it became very great. To render the two parties irreconcilable, it was insinuated to the Episcopalians, of whom the majority were Tories, that both Church and Monarchy were in danger, and that the scene of forty one was going to be revived. That the Presbyterians, under colour of providing for the preservation of liberty, really intended the destruction of the Church, and the introduction of Presbyterianism, in order to which, they were pursuing the same course they had taken in 1640, and the following years, by undermining the foundations of the Monarchy, for the more easy subversion of the Church. These insinuations had the greater effect, as what had once happened, and whereof the memory was still fresh, might happen again; and I know not, whether it may not justly be doubted, that some of the Presbyterians had such a thing in view. This was sufficient to awaken the old animosities between the Church of England and Presbyterianism. The Episcopalians, terrified with the prospect of falling into the same state, from which they had been almost miraculously delivered, considered the introduction of Popery, with which they were alarmed, as a distant and uncertain evil, and the establishment of Presbyterianism, as certain and present. It is even very probable, that many, whose passions were violent, looked upon Popery as the less evil. In this belief, they threw themselves as it were desperately into the Court-party, without considering, that the Duke of York, whose cause they espoused, was no better affected to them than to the Presbyterians. Passion made them forget the interest of the Protestant Religion, in order not to be once more under the Presbyterian yoke. On the other hand, the three last Parliaments, composed, as I observed, of men well-affected to Presbyterianism, proceeded with too little caution, and discovered too hastily or too openly their designs with regard to Religion. By that they gave the Court-party an opportunity of uniting with the Episcopalians, and of joining together the interests of Religion and the Monarchy. From that time, the Tories were so well pleased with this union, that they would never hear of separating these two interests, but once, under James II, when there was no possibility of keeping them united, without endangering the constitution in Church and State. The Whigs, on their side, having since perceived, what advantages the Tories received from this union, seem to have moderated their pretensions with respect to Religion, contenting themselves with procuring the Presbyterians a bare liberty of conscience. But the Tories not trusting to this moderation, consider it as a snare and an artifice to separate the interests of Religion from those of the State; for in this union the strength of the Tory party wholly consists. I have perhaps wandered a little too far from my subject, in speaking of these two parties, with regard to what has happened since the reign of Charles II. But I hope the Reader will not be displeased with this general idea. I return now to the transactions after the dissolution of the Oxford Parliament.

The Presbyterians being thus divided, and the Court strengthened with the Church, the Tory party was composed of all the rigid Episcopalians, mortal enemies of the Presbyterians, of all the Papists, and those to whom all Religions were indifferent, and whose expectations were centered in the Court. It may be affirmed, that the number of these last was never greater in England, the King having incessantly laboured to increase it, whether through inclination, or because he depended on such as his firmest friends. The Whig party consisted of all the Presbyterians, and of some Churchmen, who were more attached to the interests of the State, and the Protestant Religion in general, than to the Church of England in particular. But the City of London was the chief strength of this party, whose Magistrates were entirely devoted to it. Things standing thus, the King believed, he should run no great hazard in dissolving the Oxford Parliament, reckoning, he had a party in the Kingdom strong enough to resist, and even subdue his enemies, when they should be no longer supported with the authority of a Parliament. Mean while, not to alarm the nation by a too hasty discovery of his intentions as to his future Government, he contented himself at present with publishing a declaration, containing his reasons for dissolving the two last Parliaments. I shall not insert this declaration here, because every reader, who remembers what has been said, will easily comprehend wherein consisted the King's complaints. I shall only say in a word, that the King supposed as undeniable, that he had no other aim than to procure the good of his people, and that the Commons, actuated by a spirit of cabal and sedition, only sought to shake the foundations of the Monarchy, and invest themselves with arbitrary power, by all their proceedings, which he largely set forth. He positively declared, that no irregularities in Parliaments should ever make him out of love with them: and therefore he was resolved to have frequent Parliaments, and both in and out of Parliament, to use his utmost endeavours to extirpate Popery (1).

Several Pamphlets appeared, as well against the dissolution of the Parliament, as against the declaration. It was said upon the first, that though the King pretended, that he dissolved the Parliament on account of the votes passed the same day about Fitz-Harris, yet the Dukes of Maximilien published the news at St. James's many hours before it was done. As to the declaration, it was said to be of no validity, of French extract (2), and to have several manifest Gallicisms in it, particularly that expression, It was a matter extremely sensible to us, a form of speech peculiar to the French, and unknown to any other nation. But the King little regarded such labels (3).

The declaration having been published and read in the Churches (4) by the King's order, addresses flowed from all parts, approving the dissolution of the Parliament, and in general, the King's whole conduct. Not content with thanking the King, these addresses were even filled with invectives against the late Houses of Commons. One of these addresses (5) being presented at the King's Bench as a publick libel, by the Grand Jury of Middlesex, the Court took no notice of it. We may easily judge who presented these addresses, by what has been said. They became so much in vogue, that the smallest Corporations feared the resentment of the Court, if they neglected to address. The King received them all very graciously, and distinguished those that brought them with particular marks of his favour. But as some of the other party ventured to present addresses of a very different stile, the King either refused, or received them, with evident signs of his displeasure. Some of the Aldermen and Common-Council of London presenting an agreeable address, were received very kindly. But the Lord-Mayor, Recorder, and some others of the Common-Council, waiting on him at Windsor, with a very different petition, were denied admittance, and ordered to attend the Council at Hampton-Court, where they received a reprimand from the Lord Chancellor. It was however pretended, that these loyal addresses, as they were called, expressed the sentiments of the people in general, tho' they came but from one of the parties. But what may make it presumed, that the King did not much depend upon the people, notwithstanding these numerous addresses which weekly filled the Gazettes, is, that he never after dared to call a Parliament to the end of his reign, a sure sign, that he feared the elections would not be favorable to him. For if these addresses had expressed the general sense of the people, what could have hindered the King from calling a Parliament, which, to judge by these addresses, must have been devoted to him.

The King was not satisfied with discouraging those who would have presented disagreeable addresses to him, but also silenced and imprisoned the news-writers which were not of his party (1), while others had liberty to publish daily invectives against the Whigs, and the late Parliaments.

Shortly after the dissolution of the Parliament, the King made Charles Lenox Duke of Richmond, his Son by the Duchess of Portsmouth, Knight of the Garter at nine years of age. Laurence Hyde Esq; was created Viscount Hyde of Keneleworth; and Lord-Chancellor Finch Earl of Nottingham.

Notwithstanding the vote of the Commons on the account of Fitz-Harris, he was indicted of High-Treason at the King's Bench bar, tried, condemned, and executed. It is pretended, that he confessed to the Chaplain of the Tower, that there was a design laid by the Protestant party to seize the person of the King, and imprison him, till he had consented to what should be desired of him, and that he mentioned many particulars. Others pretend, this confession was forged (2), or only made to save his life. Indeed it is not easy to imagine, that so many Protestants, engaged, as was pretended, in this plot, would communicate their designs to an Irish Papist. Nor is it less difficult to conceive, why his execution was hastened, since he might have served for evidence of this plot, about which, however, there was no farther inquiry.

The same day that Fitz-Harris was executed, Oliver Plunket, the popish titular Primate of Ireland, suffered the same punishment for contriving, with the Court of France, to raise an insurrection in Ireland. Some pretend, he was condemned unjustly, and upon false evidence (3). I know not what there is in it, but from this time forward no agreement is to be expected amongst the Historians, in the relation of the same facts. It is always with some addition, which plainly discovers the party they espouse.

Thus much is certain, that the King delayed not to be revenged of some of those who had been against him. The Earl of Shaftsbury was sent to the Tower the beginning of July. He was now called the Protestant Earl, in derision of his having appeared more zealous than any other Lord in support of the Protestant party, and from hence it may be easily judged, who gave him that name. The same day, the King also sent to the Tower some persons of a much inferior rank, as Rouse, Hoys, White, and one Colledge a Joyner of London, who had been very strenuous for the Whigs, while that party was supported by the Parliament. He was also called the Protestant Joyner, for the name of Protestant was become the nick-name of those who had most opposed the King and the Papists. The adherents of the Court, on the other hand, pretend, that the Whig-party in London, perceiving the Court began to be revenged upon their enemies, had found means, with the assistance of Cornish and Bethel, Sheriffs of London, and zealous Whigs, to secure Grand-Juries entirely at their devotion, so that, to defeat the efforts of the Court, these Juries were to return Ignoramus upon all Bills brought against any of the party, and therefore obtained the name of Ignoramus. But we are not to require any proofs of this supposition. The Historians of the Court-party content themselves with affirming, as a thing beyond doubt, that the Grand-Jury of London was resolved to return Ignoramus upon all Bills against their friends, and we must take their word for it, tho' it seems to be supported only by the rumours of their own party.

However, the Court began their revenge with Colledge the Joyner, and for that purpose a Bill of indictment of High-Treason against him was delivered to the Grand-Jury of London, who, not finding it well-grounded, threw it out with an Ignoramus (4). This caused an universal joy in London, and was looked upon as a sort of triumph. But the Court was resolved to proceed against Colledge with the utmost severity. For this purpose, on pretence of certain words said to be spoken by Colledge at Oxford, he was ordered to be removed to that city, and there tried and condemned. But not to be disappointed, as they had been at London, the King's Council came to Oxford, and were shut up with the Grand-Jury, till they had persuaded them to find the Bill. This is at least a fact which has been often objected, and publicly and openly maintained, without having been denied. Be this as it will, Colledge was carried to Oxford, and tried at the assizes, upon the evidence of Dugdale and Turberville, who had been the witnesses in the trial of the Lord Stafford. It is not possible to read the particulars of this trial, the partiality of the Judges (5), and the depositions of the witnesses, without discovering a settled design for the destruction of this man, who was condemned and executed as a traitor (6). He died, protesting his innocence, and ignorance of any plot but the Popish. The Court's resentment against this man shewed itself so manifestly, that he was considered as the first martyr for the Protestant Cause. The writers, even the most devoted to the Court, dare not positively affirm, he was guilty. They content themselves with leaving the thing doubtful, after endeavouring however, by the turn they give to their account, to insinuate a belief that he was not innocent.

The same day that Colledge was executed, Dr. Oates was by order of Council turned out of Whitehall, command not to come within the verge of the Council-chamber. Indeed, he was no longer wanted, at a time when not only the popish plot was ridiculed, but a design formed of being revenged on those who had been most zealous to support the belief of it, and of improving a new Protestant plot.

The time for electing the Sheriffs of London being come, Thomas Pilkington and Samuel Shute, both Whigs, were chosen in the room of Bethel and Cornish, which was very disagreeable to the Court. But on Michaelmas-day they had the satisfaction to see Sir John Moor an Addresser, chosen Lord-Mayor.

At the sessions for London, Rouse, one of those sent to the Tower by the King, was indicted of high-treason, and the Grand-Jury found the Bill Ignoramus.

It was the same with the Earl of Shaftsbury. The King passionately wished to be revenged of this Lord, who for some time, had shewn him little regard. To this end, he granted a special commission of Oyer and Terminer to all the Judges of the Kingdom to sit, the 24th of November, with the Lord-Mayor and Aldermen, at the Old Bailey, on the Earl's trial. Eight witnesses were heard against him, who deposed upon oath many things from his own mouth, which discovered pernicious designs against the King's person. But the greatest crime objected against him was, the copy of an Association (found in his study) against the enemies of the King, of the Protestant Religion, and of their Country (7). But notwithstanding the hopes conceived by the Court, of being freed from this enemy, the Grand-Jury, consisting of one and twenty of the principal citizens of London, considering that the paper, containing the Association was only a copy, and not writ in the Earl of Shaftsbury's hand, and observing very great improbabilities in the depositions of the witnesses, found no sufficient ground for the Bill, and returned it Ignoramus. Immediately the whole city testified their joy for the Earl's deliverance, by bonfires in all the streets, and other marks of satisfaction, and the

Before we finish this year, it will be necessary to mention the transactions in Scotland, where the Duke of York, as the King's High-commissioner, had opened the Parliament the 28th of July. This Parliament, very different from the two last held in England, took a quite contrary course, and passed several Acts such as the King desired.

By the first, they acknowledged, that the Crown of Scotland is by inherent right, by the nature of Monarchy, by the fundamental and unalterable laws of the Kingdom, transmitted and devolved by Lineal Succession, according to Proximity of Blood, and that no difference in Religion, no Law, no Act of Parliament, can alter or divert the right of succession, and lineal descent of the Crown to the nearest and lawful heirs. This Act made it high-treason, either by word or writing, to endeavour to suspend, or alter, the right of succession.

By the second Act, all former Laws for the security of the Protestant Religion professed in that realm, were ratified; by which all the laws made by James I., Charles I., and Charles II., against Popery, were confirmed. To this Act was annexed a test and oath to be taken by all officers in Church and State (2). This oath was drawn in such a manner, that it imposed a necessity of swearing directly against conscience, or of being, as I may say, debarred the society of men. Accordingly, it was refused by most of the Ministers, and a great number of the Laity. But this was what the contrivers of the oath wanted, in order to have opportunity to persecute and destroy those, who, it was foreseen, would obstruct the designs of the Court. Scotland was almost reduced to slavery, with regard to the Government. Nothing was wanting, but the introduction of the Popish Religion, and for this the oath was intended, because it was thereby hoped to have opportunity of disabling the greatest enemies of Popery from opposing this design. Archibald Campbell Earl of Argyle, son of him beheaded at Edinburgh, was one of the refusers of this oath, unless he might take it with a reserve of his own explanation (3). But this the Duke of York would never allow him. Indeed these ambiguities had been purposely inserted to keep the rigid Presbyterians from taking it. At last, he was arrested, imprisoned, and brought to a solemn trial, not only for refusing the oath, but for having dissuaded others from taking it; and for this new kind of treason, was condemned to lose his head. It is pretended, the King would have pardoned him; but this can only be said by conjecture. However, he found means to escape out of the castle of Edinburgh, and withdrew into Holland (4).

It appears from what has been said, that the Whig-party mostly consisted of professed Presbyterians, or of men inclined to Presbytery, though they professed the established Religion. That is to say, the times of James I., and Charles I., were returned, when every man who was not of the Court-party, and a furious Tory, was a Presbyterian. The King finding his authority sufficiently established since the dissolution of the Oxford Parliament, resolved entirely to ruin his enemies the Whigs, and consequently the Presbyterians. To this end, he ordered, that the Non-conformists should be rigorously prosecuted, which discovered his motive for conveying away in the House of Lords the Bill to repeal the Act of the 35th of Elizabeth, at the very time it was going to pass into a law. For if this Bill had not vanished, no advantage could have been taken against the Presbyterians. This order of the King occasioned a violent persecution against the Dissenters. Since the dissolution of the last Parliament, all the Magistrates, Judges, Justices of the Peace, Governors, and Lord-Lieutenants, had been changed, and the most violent Tories put in their places. It may easily be imagined, with what joy and zeal these men executed the laws against the Presbyterians, which had been suspended for some years. The Clergy particularly distinguished themselves by showing their attachment to the principles and maxims of the Court. The pulpits resounded with the doctrine of Passive-Obedience and Non-Resistance, which had been espoused by a few in the reign of Charles I., but was now universally preached. The Clergy seemed to make it their business to surrender to the King, all the Liberties and Privileges of the Subjects, and to leave them only an unlimited obedience. According to the principles publicly preached, no English Monarch was more absolute than the King of England. This doctrine was supported in the Courts of Justice, by all the Judges and Lawyers, to the utmost of their power. All this was followed with numberless petitions and addresses, wherein the Association, and the principles from which it flowed, were utterly abhorred. This Association which had occasioned the persecution against the Dissenters, was but a chimera, and entirely founded on the paper found in the Earl of Shaftsbury's closet, without even a possibility of knowing whether it was an original, or a copy. But any man's thinking of associating the Subjects against the King, was sufficient, according to the current principles, to charge the whole Whig-party, as guilty of the greatest crime imaginable. I shall not transcribe these addresses. It suffices to say in a word, that they supported the King of England as absolute as it is possible to devise. Thus the violent Tories who then prevailed in the Corporations, were not satisfied with persecuting the Presbyterians, but also made the King an arbitrary and absolute Monarch, as if there had been no other expedient to save the Church of England from the attempts of the Presbyterians.

The Duke of York returned from Scotland, the beginning of March, and was received by the King with all possible signs of affection. At the same time came a letter to the King from Scotland, subscribed by seven Bishops, full of the Duke of York's praises, and of the happiness enjoyed by the Church of Scotland, under his administration. So that it was not the fault of these Prelates, that the Duke, though most zealous for the popish Religion, was not respected as the principal support and protector of the Protestant Church.

After two months stay in England, the Duke returned to Scotland to bring his family from thence. He went by sea, but by an unexpected accident, the ship, though the weather was fair, struck upon the sand [called the Lemon run, a great and Oars] and in a little time had above seven foot water in the hold. This obliged him to put off in his pinnace, with as many persons as it would hold, and to save himself on board the Mary yacht. It is pretended, he himself named the persons whom he would have in the boat with him, and that some Priests and Jesuits were preferred to several persons of quality, who were unfortunately drowned, with a hundred and thirty seamen, the ship sinking soon after the Duke put off. But I will not warrant this circumstance, which perhaps is only a report spread by his enemies (5). The Duke made but a short stay in Scotland. He departed within a few days for England, where he continued the rest of this reign, with great influence over the actions and counsels of the King his brother. To him is generally ascribed the rigour with which the King treated his enemies the remaining part of his reign. It is said, the King being one day importuned by the Duke to undertake things which he thought very dangerous, told him, Brother, I am resolved never to travel again, you may do so, if you please.

Though, supported by the Court and the Magistrates, the Tory-party had the advantage, the Whigs however, were not discouraged; in the expectation of causing some turn, by informing the people in pamphlets of their danger from the Court. These pamphlets were numberless, and new ones daily appeared, to attack or defend. That which made the greatest noise was, The Life of Julian the Apostate, in which a parallel was drawn between that Prince and the Duke of York. The necessity of the Exclusion was shewn, and Passive-Obedience exploded as a Mahometan doctrine. This book did but exasperate the patrons of Passive-Obedience. They took occasion from thence to carry the doctrine so high, that when, in the reign of James II., restrictions became necessary, they knew not how to make them, and many even persisted in supporting this

A Medal was also struck upon this occasion, having on one side the Earl's Effigies; and on the Reverse, the Sun behind a Cloud, darting his beams on the City of London. See Druid's Numismata. It was upon this occasion that Dryden wrote his Poem called The Medal.

(4) When the Test was in Debate, Argyle spoke zealously against the Clause, whereby all the Royal Family were excepted out of it. He said, the only Danger we could apprehend as to Popery was, if the Royal Family should happen to be converted; therefore he thought it was better to have no Act at all than such a clause in it. For this Reason, when he came to explain himself concerning the taking the Test in his own Sense, his Words were construed as a Design and a Spreading of Lies of the Proceedings of Parliament, which was capital. Accordingly he was tried and condemned. No Sentence, says Burnet, in our Age, was more universally cried out upon than this. All spoke of it, and the Duke who drove it on, with Horror. All that was said to lessen the Horror was, that Duke Lauderdale had restored the Family with such an extended Jurisdiction, that he was really the Master of all the Highlands; That, the Duke wrote to the King, was all he intended by it, as Lord Halifax shewed Burnet. Though a Person of Quality, whom Lord Argyle never names, affirmed to him, on his Honour, that he heard one in great favour say to the Duke, the thing must be done, and that it would be easier to justify the King as if it were done, than to obtain his Leave for doing it. For which reason Lord Argyle made his escape out of the Castle in a Dragoon's Uniform, p. 114, 120, 121.

(5) Burnet says, the Duke got into a Boat, and took care of his Dogs, and some unknown Persons, who were taken, from that earnest cry of his, to be his Priests. The Long-Boat went off with very few in her, though the might have carried off above eighty more than the said, p. 493. What makes this Account probable in the main, is, that the following Persons perished with the rest, the Earl of Rosborough, the Lord O'Brien, the Lord of Ropes, Sir Joseph Douglas, Lieutenant Hyde the Duke's Brother in Law. Echard, Tom. III. p. 657. The Duke, says Burnet, took no notice of this cruel neglect, which was laid chiefly to Leg's Charge. p. 525.

A Remark upon the Doctrine of Passive-Obedience.

To demonstrate, that to this time must be fixed the date of the birth, or at least of the great progress, of the doctrine of Passive-Obedience, it needs only to be considered, that the second Parliament of this reign, though chiefly composed of rigid Church-of-England men, devoted entirely to the King, after having, by Acts, established such principles as led to Passive-Obedience, readily departed from it, when the Court, as they believed, intended thereby to introduce an arbitrary Government. This shows their design was not to establish such a Government. But in 1682, the time I am speaking of, these principles were not only preached, but practised, and the King was thanked in public and solemn addresses, for having established an absolute Government. The pulpit rung with Passive-Obedience, which was enforced from the positive declarations of God; and all the Magistrates emulously strove to reduce this doctrine to practice. The Whigs on their part in their attacks of these strange opinions, threw themselves into the other extreme, and thereby gave their enemies room to accuse them as subverters of Monarchy. In short, a kind of insatiable feizel the Kingdom, and one party, instead of coming to a temper, violently embraced whatever was most contrary to the other.

Page 658. The Earl of Shaftsbury

The animosity against the Whigs was then so excessive, that even in the administration of justice, the Judges forgot common decency. The Earl of Shaftsbury having brought his action of Scandalum Magnatum, against one Mr. Craddock, the Defendant's Counsel alledged, "That there was no probability of a fair trial by a London Jury, by reason that the Earl was of the Skinner's Company, of which Sheriff Pilkington was master, and that therefore the Jury ought to be taken from some other place." The Court of King's-Bench found this exception to just, that it was ordered, "That unless the Earl would consent to try his cause by a Country Jury, it should not be tried in London." I know not whether such an exception had ever been known or admitted before. Party rage appeared in all private affairs, so that judgments were formed not according to the right, but the principles of the parties.

A Design of a grand London and other Corporations.

Though the Whigs had a great disadvantage in the Kingdom, they still preserved their superiority in London, where almost all the Magistrates were of their party; but they were not suffered long to enjoy them. Moor, the Lord-Mayor, who had been an Abolisher, and was in the interests of the Court, objected against the election of the Sheriffs, and afterwards of the Lord-Mayor, who was to succeed him; and being supported by the Privy-Council, prevailed, partly by force, and partly by consent, to have new Sheriffs (1), and a new Mayor elected of the King's party. This was a triumph for the Court, and the Earl of Shaftsbury was so sensible of it, that seeing himself like to be deprived of the protection of the City of London, he avoided the impending storm, by a retreat into Holland. It was remarked, that he was forced to shelter himself under the protection of a Republick, to which, when he was Chancellor, and one of the Cabal, he had applied that saying of Cato, Delenda est Carthago. — He died six weeks after his arrival in Holland.

The Court having got a Lord-Mayor and Sheriffs at their devotion, improving the advantage, and relying on the compliance of the Magistrates, resolved to annul the Charter of London, and afterwards those of all the other Corporations in the Kingdom. But this design was not executed till the next year.

In the mean time, the Lord-Mayor and the Sheriffs of London, were very active against the Presbyterians, and executed the laws with great severity. Moreover, to recommend themselves the more to the Court, they prevented the burning of the Pope, as had been customary on the 17th of November (2).

The Duke of York embracing so favorable a juncture, brought his action against the late Sheriff Pilkington, for these words, spoken by the Defendant, The Duke of York has fired the City, and is now come to cut our throats. The Jury found for the Duke, and gave him one hundred thousand pounds damages. To such height was party rage carried.

Before we finish the events of this year 1682, which was memorable only for the progress of the Court and the Tories, the downfall of the Whigs, and the persecution of the Presbyterians; I shall relate some other things which happened this year.

First, the murder of Mr. Thynne, almost in the heart of the city, by Count Ceningsmärke, for which his footman Mr. Thynne was hanged. As this is a private affair, I shall say no more of it.

This year the King received two extraordinary embassies, one from the King of Fex and Mercia, the other from the King of Bantam in the life of the

This year Count Palatine of the Rhine, so often mentioned in the foregoing reign, sixty three years of age; John Maitland Duke of Lauderdale; Henry Lord; and Anthony Ashley Cooper Earl of Shaftsbury.

On the other hand, the King created several Peers (3), amongst the rest, the Duke of Ormond, an Irish Duke, was promoted to the same dignity in England.

Lastly, the Earl of Sunderland was restored to the office of Secretary, upon the resignation of the Earl of Conway.

The King having had no extraordinary supplies from the Parliament for some years, it would be astonishing that he should at once become so good an economist, as to live upon his revenues, if it had not afterwards appeared, that he had contracted many debts, and thereby supplied in some measure the aids of money, which, on one pretence or other, he had used to receive from the Parliament. The Court pursued the same course, without any appearance of intending to use their new power for raising money upon the people. It is not seen, however, that in the present situation, did not summon a Parliament, as well to repeal what had been enacted against him, as to get a supply of money. Pretences would not have been wanting. That was not the thing. But it seemed, that notwithstanding the multitude of addresses, which were still daily presented, he did not confide in the affection of his people, and feared, that the elections would not be favorable to him. Indeed these addresses came but from one party, and the King knew, it was very possible to receive addresses from all the Corporations in England, without being assured, that the People in general were well-affected. But as foreigners may not understand this, I shall briefly explain it.

England is almost all divided into Communities, called Corporations, which have each their privileges, obtained from the Sovereigns on certain conditions. There is scarce a town, which has not its Magistrates and Laws as a Corporation. The Mayor, or head of the Corporation, the Aldermen, the Recorder, and other principal officers, are elected either by the whole community, or by a certain number of townsmen. It is easy therefore to apprehend, that the prevailing party may, without great difficulty, form a Common-Council of their own principles, and it is this Common-Council which manages the addresses presented to the King, in the name of the whole Corporation. Provided the superiority of voices in the Common Council be for one of the parties, that suffices, if an address be ordered, to say, it is in the name of the Town or Community, though all the other members should be of a contrary opinion. But in choosing Representatives, another method is taken. For then every Burgeis, every Freeholder, has a right to give his vote, and consequently Representatives of a contrary party to the Magistrates and Common-Council may very possibly be elected. This, probably, hindered the King from venturing to call a new Parliament, for fear he should not find his account in it. For the same voters who had chosen the members of the two last Parliaments, would have had a right to vote for the members of a new one, which could not be advantageous to the Court. The Court therefore came to a resolution of refusing the Charters of the Corporations, and to grant others drawn in such manner, that the King should be almost enabled to cause such Representatives to be chosen, as he pleased. It may be affirmed, there was no readier or more effectual way to invade at once the liberties of the nation, and cause the Parliament itself to approve of the same.

Till things should be ripe for the execution of this design, or some favorable occasion offer itself, the King resolved to take the diversions of New-Market. He had scarce been there six days, when a fire broke out in the town with such violence, that he was obliged to return to London some days sooner than he designed. It was pretended afterwards, that there was, at this time, a plot against his life, to be executed at New-Market, and which was prevented by the King's sudden return, occasioned by the fire. This accident was ascribed to a particular 1682-3. Providence preserving the King, when he was in such danger.

1683. The King intending to be revenged on the old Magistracy of London, which had opposed him for some years, issued out a Commission for trial of the authors of the disorder at the election of Sheriffs the last year. This disorder, in the commission, was called a riotous and unlawful Assembly, and aggravated as much as a thing of such little moment could admit of. Fourteen Aldermen and substantial Citizens, the leaders of the Whigs, were all tried and condemned in great fines (1).

But the King stopped not here, though the new Magistrates and Common-Council took care to give him marks of their respect and zeal, by repealing several Acts of the Court of Common-Council, made during the late troubles (2). They likewise replaced, in its nich in the Royal Exchange, the statue of Charles I. which had been taken down after his death. Nevertheless, this did not prevent a Quo Warranto from being brought by the King against the City, that is, an order to show by what warrant they pretended to be a Corporation, and enjoy the privileges mentioned in the writ. On such occasions, the Corporation, against whom the Quo Warranto is sent, produces the Charter of their privileges, and the question is to know, whether they have exactly obeyed the conditions and articles of their Charter. If they have been faulty in any essential article, the Court, before whom the affair is brought, may declare their Privileges and Charter forfeited. This rarely happens, because a Corporation is not wont to break their Charter in essential articles, for fear of losing it; and if it is in a point of little importance, the Court is satisfied with a fine to the King. This is the practice where justice, and a maintenance of the laws and customs of the Kingdom are only intended. But, in the present case, the King's intention was not to maintain justice and the laws, but to take occasion from the breach of some article of the Charter, to seize the liberties of London into his hands, and render himself absolute master of the government of that City. The present juncture was very favorable to his design, because, since the dissolution of the Oxford Parliament, he had taken care to fill the Courts of Justice with Judges devoted to him, and to these Judges was committed the decision of this affair.

The King alleged two violations of the Charter by the Corporation of London. The first was the illegal exaction of Tolls in the Market, and particularly the raising money to rebuild Chesham Conduit. The second was the framing and printing a scandalous petition, wherein they charged the King with obstructing the justice of the Nation, by proroguing the last Wythminster Parliament. This affair was argued solemnly on both sides, and at last the Judges of the King's Bench declared, that the liberties and privileges of the City of London were forfeited, and might be seized into the King's hands. Nevertheless, it was declared by the express command of the King, That judgement should not be entered until his Majesty's pleasure should be further known.

Several reflections on this judgement were then, and still are, made, which are not to the honour either of the King or the Court. However, the Inhabitants of London were extremely surprized with the thing, and the Common-Council assembled to consult how to proceed in this exigency. Some were for having the judgement entered till an opportunity offered to procure a reversal. But the Court-party insisted upon an absolute submission to the King before judgement was entered, which was in effect a voluntary surrender of the privileges of the City into the King's hands, and a depriving it of the means to cause the sentence one day to be repealed. This opinion was carried by a majority, and the King was waited on with a petition agreeable to this resolution. The King answered by the Lord-Keeper North, That he would restore the Charter if the City would submit to the following regulations.

1. That no Lord-Mayor, nor any officer of the Corporation, or Steward of the Borough of Southwark, should be capable of, or admitted to the exercise of their respective offices, before his Majesty should have approved them under his sign Manual.

2. That if his Majesty should disapprove the choice of any person to be Lord-Mayor, &c. the Citizens should, within one week, proceed to a new choice: And if his Majesty should in like manner disapprove the second choice, his Majesty might if he pleased, nominate a person to be Lord-Mayor for the ensuing year.

3. The same with regard to the Sheriffs.

4. The Lord-Mayor and Court of Aldermen might also, with the leave of his Majesty, displace any Alderman, Recorder, &c.

5. Upon the election of any Alderman, if the Court of Aldermen should judge and declare the person presented to be unfit, the Ward should chuse again; and upon a disapproval of a second choice, the Court might appoint another in his room.

6. The Justices of the peace were to be by the King's commission; and the letting of these matters to be left to his Majesty's Attorney and Solicitor-General, and Council learned in the Law.

By these articles, it is evident, the King was absolute master of the government of the City, and by restoring their Charter, effectually deprived them of their principal privileges.

Two days after, the Common-Council met, and resolved to submit to the King, by a majority of eighteen voices (3). The Historians of the King's party speak of this affair very slightly, pretending the City was justly punished for their great provocations to the King of late years. But as to the conduct of the King and Court, which occasioned these provocations, they do not think proper to mention it, and so the whole blame lies upon the City.

We are at last come to the pretended Protestant Plot, that is to say, form'd by the Protestants against the King and the Duke. But as it is hard to conceive the agreement of this term, in a Protestant Country, with designs framed by Protestants against Papists, and as some gladly remove the idea of the King and Duke of York's being Papists, they rather chuse to give it the name of the Rye-House-Plot, from a House so called, in the road to Newmarket (4), where, it is pretended, the conspirators had projected to kill the King and Duke. I must not conceal, that as the former conspiracy, called the Popish-plot, did then, and still does, pass for an invention, with the adherents of the Court, so this had the same fate among those who were, or still are, of the contrary party. The History of this Conspiracy must therefore be read with great caution; since the Historians are entirely divided, the one representing as false, what the others assert as true. Were they both contented with relating the bare facts, giving for true those that may be proved, as for false those whose contrary cannot be proved, and for doubtful such as are doubtful, the Reader might be able to form some judgement. But their Accounts are artfully laboured to prepossess the Reader. A thousand things are insinuated which have no foundation but in their System. The witnesses are either knaves or honest men, as is most for their advantage. The conspiracy in their recitals is supposed true or false at pleasure. Numberless circumstances are inserted to serve their purpose, without the least proof or authority. So the Reader, who is in search of truth, finds himself at a loss, it being impossible to enter into a particular examination of so many opposite things. Impartial readers content themselves with leaving the matter undecided, because they see no proofs strong enough to determine their assent either way. Others, through prejudice in favour of one of the parties, or through laziness or indifference, implicitly follow the sentiments of the Historian, or absolutely reject them.

To avoid therefore as much as possible the faults which I condemn, I shall suppress all insinuations of the Historians of both parties; and confine my self to the depositions and defences of the accused, without adding any circumstance which is not owned by both sides.

This year, on the 12th of June, Josiah Keeling discovered the conspiracy, real or pretended, to the Lord Dartmouth, and Secretary Jenkins, before whom he made open confession of the whole matter, and subscribed his depositions. But afterwards, considering that his single intelligence was not sufficient, he prevailed upon Goodenough, that his Brother John Keeling might be admitted into the next meeting of the Conspirators. This was done, and thereupon both the Brothers gave in their joint testimony upon oath on the 14th of June.

It must be observed, that this circumstance of the admission of John Keeling into the secrets of the plot, manifestly supposes a conspiracy. Accordingly it is only produced by those Historians who believe the reality of the plot.

In the second place, the discovery of the plot being made by Josiah Keeling, the 12th of June, and the deposition of the two Brothers being given in the 14th, it follows that, according to the first supposition, John Keeling had but one day to be informed of the secrets of this plot.

According to the two Keelings deposition, the plot consisted of three articles. 1. The conspirators designed to secure the King's guards (but how this was to be executed does not appear;) then to block up or besiege Whitehall, and seize the persons of the King and Duke of York. 2. To assassinate the King and the Duke in a hollow way near the Rye-House, in their return from Newmarket. 3. To cause insurrections in London, and other parts of the Kingdom (1). But Keeling deposed only against persons of no note.

Upon this deposition, the King published a proclamation for apprehending, Colonel John Runsey, Richard Rumbold Maltster (2), Richard Nelthorpe Esq; Edward Wade Gent. Richard Goodenough Gent. Capt. Walcott, William Thompson, James Burton, and William Hone; for any of which a hundred pounds was offered to the discoverer. Upon this Proclamation, Colonel Runsey surrendered himself the next day; and being examined by Secretary Jenkins, he confessed all he knew; which confession was next day confirmed by two others, Mr. West and Mr. Sheppard. So that on the sixth of June, there came out a second Proclamation, for apprehending James Duke of Monmouth, Ferd Lord Grey, Sir Thomas Ashburn Knight, and Robert Ferguson. It is pretended, that when the Warrants were delivered to Legat the Messenger, to seize Ferguson with the rest of the offenders, Secretary Jenkins gave Legat a strict command, not to take him, but to show him where ever he met him. Shortly after, the Lord Howard of Effraie also surrendered himself, and upon his information, Warrants for High Treason were issued against the Earl of Essex, the Lord Russell, and others, who were taken up accordingly.

This discovery brought addresses from all parts to congratulate the King. The Ambassadors of foreign Princes paid the same compliment; and the King of France allowed five hundred Pounds for the apprehension of Monmouth, Grey, Ashburn, and Ferguson.

The Prisoners were not suffered long to languish. Walcott was first brought to his trial the 10th of July, and against him, Runsey swore, "That the Prisoner came to a meeting at West's Chamber, where the Deponent was present, when a list was brought of the Assassins, and agreed to join with them, intending to command a party that should charge the guards. That he undertook to go and view Rumbold's house, and bought a horse for that purpose. That he was present at the dividing London into twenty parts, in order to an insurrection; and at the consult for buying arms after the disappointment at the Rye-House. That he was at the meeting for carrying on the conspiracy on Thursday, before the discovery; and that, after it, they met at Captain Tracy's, Walcott's own Lodgings, the Deponent being present."

Keeling deposed, "That Walcott was at the traitorous assembly at the Salutation-Tavern, where the Deponent was called Culing, and a health drunk to the English Culing; West declaring, that Culing in Dutch was Keeling in English, adding, he hoped to see Keeling at the head of as good an army in Wapping, as the Lord of Culing was then at Cologne."

Bourn swore, "That Walcott used to come to Ferguson when he lodged at his house; and that he and several others met at the Dragon on Snow-Hill, and often at other places, in order to raise men, and divide the City into twenty parts, for securing the King and the Duke: That almost every time they met, at least three times, the prisoner at the Bar was there: That he was at the last meeting at Tracy's, where they debated of standing with sword in hand, and of killing Keeling for making the discovery."

West testified, "That the Prisoner, upon the election of the London Sheriff, asked him, Will the People do nothing to secure themselves? And acquainted him with the insurrection then designed within three weeks or a month: That the Earl of Shaftsbury was in the design, and had engaged the prisoner: That he had an expectation of being a Colonel of horse; asking the Deponent, Whether he would have any command under him? That upon his refusal, he desired him to lend him a suit of silk-armor: That the said Walcott told him of several designs to attack the King and the Duke: That in the business of the Rye-House, he undertook to command the party that was to set on the guards."

Besides these witnesses, there was a letter produced, under Walcott's own hand, to Secretary Jenkins, in which he said, "That if his Majesty desired it, he would discover to him all that he knew in England, Scotland, or Ireland, which might be something more than the original discoverer could acquaint him with, especially as to Ireland: That his intimacy with a Scotch Minister, through whose hands much of the business went, occasioned his knowing very much, &c."

Walcott's defence consisted, first, of a plain denial of Walcott's having any hand in the Assassination; saying, "He knew well enough, if he had undertaken to charge the guards, while others killed the King, he was equally guilty with those that killed him; but that he was sick of the gout during the meetings, while the King was at Newmarket." To this West replied, "That he remembered it well, by a good token, that the prisoner himself said, 'He was afraid when the time comes, he should not be able to draw on his boots.'" Walcott added, "That he came accidentally to their meetings only to hear news. That what he had promised to discover, he had only heard from Ferguson." In conclusion, he was brought in guilty of high-treason by the Jury.

Those who think this plot was only an artifice of the Court, to destroy their chief enemy, observe, that the depositions of the witnesses against Walcott, and the other pretended conspirators, are all consistent on the supposition, that there was really a design to seize the King's guards, assassinate him and the Duke, and raise an insurrection, and upon a previous narrative of this method of proceeding, supposed to be an expedient, to which the lesser conspirators were added, before the result of the design was proved.

In the second place, they say, that the depositions are incoherent. For the conspirators must have had at the same time two contrary designs, one to secure the King's person, to oblige him to confess to their proposals, and the other to assassinate him; two designs which can hardly stand together.

Their adversaries reply, that once proved by the depositions of the witnesses, that the conspirators had met at such and such meetings, where the King's assassination was mentioned, and having once met, according to the design, the supposition was sufficient to proceed.

I shall not relate the trials of the other Prisoners of this plot, but confine my self to the Lord Russell, son to the Lord Duke of Bedford. This Lord being one of those against whom the Court was most successful, because he had proposed the Exclusion Bill in the House of Commons, and carried it up to the Lords, he was tried the 12th of July at the Old Bailey, before eight Judges. He was very urgent for one day longer for his trial, because, as he said, he had witnesses that might come before his trial, but he was overruled. He then urged to have his trial deferred to the afternoon, but with no better success. Three witnesses appeared against him, Colonel Runsey, for evidence against Walcott, Mr. Sheppard, and the Lord Howard of Effraie.

Runsey deposed, "That in the end of October, or Runsey's Deposition, in the beginning of November 1682, there met at Mr. Sheppard's house in Abchurch-lane, the Duke of Monmouth, the Lord Grey, the Lord Russell the prisoner, Sir Thomas Armstrong, and Robert Ferguson: That the Earl of Shaftsbury desired him to go to town thither, to know what relation it would stand with the raising of Tauxton; that he did go, and Mr. Sheppard carried him up where they were, and he delivered his message. That the answer was, Mr. Trenchard had failed them, and there would be no more done in the matter, at that time: That there was at the same time a discourse by all the company, about seeing what posture the guards were in, that they might know how to surprize them: That some of them undertook to go and see: That the Lord Russell in particular did speak about the rising, and gave his consent to it."

Mr. Sheppard testified, "That in October last, Ferguson desired of him, in the Duke of Monmouth's name, the convenience of his house, for the meeting of some persons of quality; and that the same day in the evening, the Duke of Monmouth, the Lord Grey, the Lord Russell, Sir Thomas Armstrong, Colonel Runsey, and Ferguson came; that they desired to be private, and none of his servants to come up: That their discourse was how to surprize the guards: That the Duke of Monmouth, the Lord Grey, and Sir Thomas Armstrong, went one night to the Mews to view them: That the next time they came (3), Armstrong said, the guards were very remiss, and the thing was feasible: That they had two meetings of this kind at his house; that in one of them something was read by Ferguson in the nature of a

The Lord Howard's Deposition.

The Lord Howard began his testimony, with a long story about the plot in general, which seemed to be designed only to exasperate the Jury; after which he deposed to this effect: "That after the Earl of Shaftsbury's flight, the chief persons concerned in the conspiracy, in his time, began to confide, they had gone so far, that it was unsafe for them to make a retreat; and that in so great an affair, consisting of such infinite particulars, to be managed with so much fineness, it would be necessary to have some general Council; and that therefore they resolved to erect a Cabal among themselves, which usually consisted of six persons, the Duke of Monmouth, the Earl of Essex, the Lord Russell, Colonel Sidney, Mr. Hampden junior, and the deponent; and this was about the middle of January last. They met at Mr. Hampden's house, where it was presently agreed, their proper province was to take care of the insurrection: That the chief things they debated were, Whether that insurrection should begin first in London, or the Country; then what counties and towns were the fittest, and most disposed to action; then, what arms were to be got, and how to be disposed; then, that it was necessary to have a common Bank of twenty-five, or thirty thousand pounds, to answer the occasions of such an undertaking; but that the greatest point was, to order it so, as to draw in Scotland into a confent with them; because it was requisite, that all kinds of diversion should be given to the King's forces. That about ten days after, every one of the same persons met again at the Lord Russell's house: That they then came to a resolution of sending some persons to the Earl of Argyll, to settle a correspondence with him, and that some messengers should be dispatched into Scotland, to invite some Scotchmen hither, who best understood the state of Scotland, to give an account of it: That the persons determined to be sent for, were Sir John Cockburn, the Lord Melville, and one of the name of Campbell: That Colonel Sidney was intrusted to take care of a messenger; and he told the deponent, he had sent Aaron Smith; then they agreed not to meet again till the return of the messenger, who was gone about a month before they read any thing of him: That all this debate at the Lord Russell's went without contradiction, all there present giving their consent: That as for raising of money, every one was put to think of such a way, that money might be collected without giving cause of jealousy. That, after all this, the deponent met no more with them; but, when he returned out of the Country, he was informed, that Aaron Smith was come back, and that Sir John Cockburn was also come to town."

To all this the Lord Russell made answer, "That he could not but think himself mighty unfortunate, to stand charged with so high a crime, and that intermixed with the treasons, horrid practices and speeches of other people, while the King's Counsel took all advantages, and heightened things against him. That he was no lawyer, a very unready speaker, and altogether a stranger to things of this nature: That he was sensible he was not so provided to make his defence, as otherwise he should do; but he thought the Gentlemen of the Jury were men of confidence, that valued innocent blood, and hoped they would consider the witnesses, that they swore to save their own lives. That the two times they met, was upon no formed design, only to talk of news and things in general: That the Lord Howard having a vobule tongue, they delighted to hear him discourse: That he knew of no such Council as fix chosen, for who should chuse them?" As to Colonel Rumsey, "He was notoriously known to have been highly obliged to the King and the Duke; and it was strange he should be capable of such a design as to murder the King. That the time was elapsed by the 13th of the King, which limits prosecution to six months. Neither was the design of leaving war, treason, unless it appeared by some overt-act." And asking upon what Statute he was indicted, he was told, "The Statute of the 25th of Edward the Third." Upon which he insisted upon a matter of law, and particularly, "That the business at Mr. Sheppard's house was sworn to only by one witness." To which he was answered, "That if there were one witness of one act of treason, another of a second, and another of a third, that manifested the same treason, it was sufficient."

For a further defence of his Lordship, there appeared for him the Duke of Somerset, the Earl of Anglesey, Mr. Edward Howard, the Lord Cavendish, the Lord Clifford, 1683. Doctor Tillotson, Doctor Burnet, Doctor Cox, Doctor Fitz-Williams, Mr. Luton Gore, and Mr. Spencer. Some of these Burnet testified, that the Lord Howard, before he was taken, de- P. 546, 554. clared, "He believed the Lord Russell innocent, and knew nothing against him." Others spoke to his Lordship's private character, and declared his great worth and probity, his virtuous and sober life, and consequently the improbability of his being thus engaged. But this was turned against him by the King's Counsel, who said, there could not be any more dangerous enemies to a State, than such as come sober to endeavour its destruction.

As to what concerned the Lord Howard's saying, he be- State-Trials lieved the prisoner innocent, it was answered by that Lord himself, who confessed, "He had said so, being then him- self not accused, so that he intended to out-face the thing both for himself and the party; but now, his duty to God, the King, and his Country required it, he must say the truth; and that though the Council of six were not chosen by any community, yet they did erect them- selves by mutual agreement one with another into that society."

In conclusion, the Jury brought him in guilty of High-Treason. This sentence was considered by all, who had any sense of shame left, as the most crying injustice ever known in England. For the Lord Russell was condemned for words spoken in his hearings, which in England can never pass for treason. The Lord Howard so lost his reputation, for being accessory to this injustice, that he was looked on with horror by honest men, who avoided his company, as ashamed or afraid to be seen with him. Some say, he had made his peace with the King a little before, by the mediation of the Duchess of Portsmouth, and by an engagement to serve as a witness against the pretended conspirators.

But that which was believed to have very much influenced the Jury against the Lord Russell, was, that in the very time of his trial, the Earl of Essex, prisoner in the Tower, was found dead in his chamber, with his throat cut from ear to ear with a razor. The news was immediately brought to the Old-Bailey, and communicated to the Judges and the King's Counsel, who from thence took occasion to insinuate to the Jury the reality of the plot (1) since the Earl of Essex rather chose to lay violent hands on himself, than stand a trial.

Tho' the Coroner's Inquest, after an examination of the dead body, found the Earl Felo de se, this was not capable to remove the suspicion entertained by most people, that this fact was committed by the order of the King and Duke, who were in the Tower that very morning, where they had not been for twelve years before. It was besides urged, that it was not possible for a man to cut his own throat from ear to ear. Several other circumstances were added, of which it is not easy to discover the truth. It is pretended, that in the blood sprinkled on the floor of the room, were discover'd the marks of a strange foot; and that after the deed was done, the razor was thrown out of the window, and pickt up by a little girl. That before the Coroner came to inspect the body, care was taken to strip and leave it naked, and to wash the room. That the Coroner demanding to see the cloaths, was answered, it was his business to examine the body, and not the cloaths. What has been most plausibly urged, in vindication of the King and Duke from this horrid action, is, that persons of credit have testified their frequent hearing the Earl of Essex declare, that self-murder was no sin. It is further added, that his Countess, and Sir Henry Capel his brother, owned the justice of the Coroner's verdict. But had they believed the contrary, this was no proper time to discover their suspicions. I am very certain, the last Earl of Essex, his son, was of another opinion, and have heard him say, he believed his father was murdered, and that a French footman, who then served his father, was strongly suspected, and disappeared immediately after the fact. Be this as it will, the general opinion then was, and still is, that this unfortunate Nobleman fell a sacrifice to the revenge of the King and the Duke. This seems the less strange, as among those who declared most openly for their Country, against the King and Duke, the Earl of Essex was not the only person who felt the effects of their resentment. The King however publicly declared in print, that he was deeply afflicted for the Earl of Essex's death, because he was thereby deprived of an opportunity to exercise his clemency, and testify, how highly he valued the memory of the Lord Capel. But, instead of convincing the publick by this external demonstration, it was by many imagined, that the King mentioned the Lord Capel, only to insinuate, how much the Earl his son had deviated from his steps.

Besides the Lord Russell condemned for this Plot, two

But he was re-taken, and tried for the same crime, which did not properly belong to this plot, but to his having talked of the King in treasonable terms. Hone and Rouse were both condemned as traitors, and executed with Walcot, the 20th of July. They confessed, they had heard of a plot in general, but defended not to particulars. At least, it did not appear, that the Lord Russel had any correspondence with them.

The next day, the Lord Russel was also executed (1). He was so universally esteemed, that it could not be thought, the King would refuse his pardon, which was begged by so many powerful relations. It is even said, the Earl of Bridford his father, offered a hundred thousand pounds for his life, but his offer was rejected. The King would not so much as grant a reprieve of six weeks to his Lady, though daughter of the Earl of Southampton, but made her this answer, Shall I grant that man six weeks, who, if it had been in his power, would not have granted me six hours? Every one however was persuaded, that if there was a design to kill the King, the Lord Russel was not concerned in it. Besides, that he denied it with his last breath, he was not condemned for that crime, and the witnesses which deposed against him said nothing like it. And yet, the King, to have an excuse for refusing a short delay, supposed that this crime was fully proved. It cannot be denied, that though the Lord Russel had been guilty of the crime for which he was condemned, namely, of giving a tacit consent to the design of an insurrection, the King could never have had an opportunity of exercising his clemency with more applause, to a man of so known virtue, near relation of the greatest families in the Kingdom. But all these considerations were weak, against the passion of revenge with which the King and the Duke of York were actuated. The Lord Russel had been one of the warmest opposers of the Duke of York, had joined the Earls of Shafsbury and Essex, and carried up the Exclusion-bill to the House of Lords. These were crimes not to be forgiven by the King and his brother. But perhaps most of my readers, after having perused the transactions of this reign, will not think it so enormous a crime to endeavour to oppose an arbitrary power, which was beginning to be introduced. He died with great resolution, protesting his innocence, and ignorance of any design against the King's person, or of any contrivance to alter the Government. As it was expected that he would be interrupted, he spoke but little on the scaffold, leaving in the hands of the Sheriff a paper, in which he protested his innocence, and said, That he died a true and sincere Protestant, and in the Communion of the Church of England, though he could never yet comply with, or rise up to all the heights of some people.

For a conclusion to this tragedy, it remains only to speak of the condemnation and execution of Colonel Algernon Sidney, who was accused of the plot, and of the design to kill the King. He was brother to the Earl of Leicester, and, in the late troubles, had been deeply engaged in the Republican party. At the Restoration he thought not fit to accept personally of the Indemnity, whether in distrust of the King, or for some other reason. At last, in 1677, he obtained a particular pardon of the King, and returned to England, where he joined the Country party, at which the King was extremely offended.

Dispositions of the Nov. 21.
p. 715, 716.

Four witnesses were produced against him, Runfey, West, Keeling, and the Lord Howard of Epsrick. The three first contented themselves with giving a particular account of the plot, but said nothing directly against the prisoner. He complained of it as a great hardship, as prepossessing the Jury. The Lord Howard deposed, as before at the trial of the Lord Russel, that Colonel Sidney was of the Council of Six, and had sent Aaron Smith into Scotland, to engage the Scots in a rebellion.

II. Defences.

His defence was, first, the great improbability of erecting a Council of Six; and that persons so little knowing one another, should presently fall into so great and intimate a friendship. As to the Duke of Monmouth, he said, he never spoke with him above three times in his life; and one time was, when Lord Howard brought him to his House and cozened them both; for he told the Duke, that Colonel Sidney had invited him, and he told the Colonel, that the Duke invited himself, and neither of them was true. He enlarged upon the ill reputation of the Lord Howard, and his varying his evidence with respect to the Lord Russel's, and the present trial. He alledged the Lord Howard's indigence, and his owing him money, which debt might probably be cancelled by his conviction. He proved, by the testimonies of the Earls of Clare and Anglesey, of Mr. Philip, and Mr. Edward Howard, Dr. Burnet, Mr. Ducar, and Mr. Blake, that the Lord Howard had confessed, That he could not get his pardon until he had done other jobs, till he was paid the drudgery of swearing.

During this whole trial, the Judges themselves undertook to answer the reasons of the accused, without leaving any thing for the King's Council to do. But they did not the objection drawn from the confession of Lord Howard, nor did he himself make any reply. So that the design of the Court to furnish the Jury with reasons to condemn the prisoner, manifestly appeared.

But what was most urged against him, was a manuscript found among his papers. It was an answer to a book, composed by Sir John Filmer, in which he had asserted, that of God and Nature, Kings, and particularly those of England, were invested with absolute and unlimited power. Sidney, in his answer to this book, had asserted a quite contrary doctrine, and carried his republican principles to a very great height.

He said first, that the manuscript was not writ by him, and he saw no reason for ascribing it to him. That though he was the author, it might be writ many years ago, in answer to Filmer's book, with no intention of publishing it, but disputandi gratia, only for private diversion, and the exercise of his pen. In fine, he insisted very much upon the necessity of two witnesses to the same fact. The Court, as I said, answered all his objections, but it plainly appears, it was with wretched cavils and subtilties. To the manuscript it was answered, that scribere est agere, and that there was sufficient in it to prove the malice of his heart, and his treasonable designs. I know not whether the English Lawyers are agreed in this maxim (2). However, he was brought in guilty by the Jury. It is pretended, that this was the first time a man was accused of treason, and condemned to die, for writing any thing without publishing it.

He was beheaded the 7th of December, without discovering the least weakness. Instead of a Speech on the scaffold, he delivered a writing to the Sheriff, in which he complained bitterly of the injustice done him. He represented the infamous life of the Lord Howard, and the Judges, as men corrupted, and only promoted to serve the designs of the Court.

While these pretended conspirators were vigorously prosecuted, the University of Oxford distinguished themselves in a particular manner, amongst the advocates for the Court, by a condemnation in form of twenty seven propositions, collected out of several modern authors, concerning the regal power. This decree was presented to the King with great solemnity, and very graciously received. In the decree itself will appear the sentiments of the University at that time.

The Judgment and Decree of the University of Oxford, passed in the Convocation, July 21. 1683, against certain pernicious Books, and damnable Doctrines, destructive to the sacred persons of Princes, their State and Government, and of all human Society (3).

Although the barbarous assassination lately enterprized against the person of his sacred Majesty, and his royal brother, engage all our thoughts to reflect with the utmost detestation and abhorrence on that execrable villany, hateful to God and man, and pay our due acknowledgments to the Divine Providence, which by extraordinary methods brought it to pass, that the breath of our nostrils, the anointed of the Lord, is not taken in the pit which was prepared for him; and that under his shadow we continue to live, and enjoy the blessings of his Government; yet notwithstanding, we find it to be a necessary duty at this time to search into, and lay open those impious doctrines, which having of late been studiously disseminated, gave rise and growth to these nefarious attempts; and pass upon them our solemn public censure, and decree of condemnation.

Therefore, to the honour of the holy and undivided Trinity, the preservation of Catholick truth in the Church, and that the King's Majesty may be secured both from the attempts of open bloody enemies, and

- "I. All civil authority is derived originally from the people.
- "II. There is a mutual compact, tacit or express, between a Prince and his Subjects; and that if he perform not his duty, they are discharged from theirs.

- "VI. It is lawful for Subjects, without the consent, and against the command of the supreme Magistrate, to enter into leagues, covenants and associations, for defence of themselves and their Religion. Solemn League and Covenant. Late Association.
- "VII. Self-preservation is the fundamental law of nature, and supercedes the obligation of all others, whenever they stand in competition with it. Hobbes, de Cive; Leviathan.
- "VIII. The doctrine of the Gospel, concerning patient suffering of injuries, is not inconsistent with violent resisting of the higher powers, in case of persecution for Religion. Lex Rex. Julian the Apostate. Apologist. Relat.
- "IX. There lies no obligation upon Christians to Passive Obedience, when the Prince commands any thing against the laws of our Country; and the primitive Christians chose rather to die than resist, because Christianity was not settled by the laws of the Empire. Julian the Apostate.
- "X. Possession and strength give a right to govern; and success in a cause or enterprize, proclaims it to be lawful and just: To pursue it, is to comply with the will of God, because it is to follow the conduct of his Providence. Hobbes. Owen's Sermon before the Regicides, Jan. 31. 1648. Baxter. Jenkins's Petition, Quid, 1651.
- "XI. In the state of nature there is no difference between good and evil, right and wrong: The state of nature is a state of war, in which every man hath a right to all things.
- "XII. The foundation of civil authority is this natural right, which is not given but left to the supreme Magistrate, upon men's entering into societies: And not only a foreign invader, but a domestic rebel, put himself again into a state of nature, to be proceeded against, not as a Subject, but an enemy; and consequently acquires by his rebellion the same right over the life of his Prince, as the Prince for the most heinous crimes has over the life of his own Subjects.
- "XIII. Every man, after his entering into a Society, retains a right of defending himself against force; and cannot transfer that right to the Commonwealth, when he consents to that union whereby a Commonwealth is made: And in case a great many men together have already resisted the Commonwealth, for which every one of them expected death, they have liberty then to join together to assist and defend one another: Their bearing of arms, subsequent to the first breach of their duty, tho' it be to maintain what they have done, is no new unjust act; and if it be only to defend their persons, it is not unjust at all.
- "XIV. An oath superadds no obligation to pacts, and a pact obliges no further than it is credited: And consequently, if a Prince gives any indication, that he does not believe the promises of Fealty and Allegiance made by any of his Subjects, they are thereby freed from their Subjection; and notwithstanding their pacts and oaths, may lawfully rebel against, and destroy their Sovereign. Hobbes de Cive. Leviathan.
- "XV. If a People, that by oath and duty are obliged to a Sovereign, shall sinfully disposseess him, and, contrary to their Covenants, chuse and covenant with another; they may be obliged by their latter Covenants, notwithstanding their former. Baxter's H. C.
- "XVI. All oaths are unlawful, and contrary to the word of God. Quakers.
- "XVII. An oath obligeth not in the sense of the imposters, but the takers. Sheriff's Case.
- "XVIII. Dominion is founded in Grace.
- "XIX. The powers of this world are usurpations upon the prerogative of Jesus Christ; and it is the duty of God's people to destroy them, in order to the setting Christ upon his Throne. Fifth-Monarchy-Men.
- "XX. The Presbyterian Government is the scepter of Christ's Kingdom, to which Kings as well as others are bound to submit, and the King's supremacy in ecclesiastical affairs, asserted by the Church of England, is injurious to Christ, the sole King and head of the Church. *Altare Damascenum. The marriage of the Princess Anne, second daughter of the Duke of York, with Prince George, brother to the King of Denmark, celebrated the 28th of July, gave some, but no long interruption to the prosecutions of the conspirators.

We have seen that the city of London complied with the King's pleasure in relation to their Charter. But it seems the King repented of his being so favorable. The election of a Lord-Mayor, which is usually on the 29th of September, having been deferred to the 6th of October, the King, on pretence that the city had not tendered him a formal submission, ordered the judgment upon the Quo Warranto to be entered. By this the city being without a Charter, the Government was seized by the King, who sent a commission to Sir William Pritchard to continue in the execution of his office during pleasure. He confirmed likewise the two Sheriffs with the same restriction, and displaced the Recorder, naming another in his room (1). Shortly after, on St. Simon and Jude's day, on which it is customary for the new Lord-Mayor to take the oaths in the Court of Exchequer, the King appointed a new Lord-Mayor during his pleasure. Thus the city of London saw itself without Charter or Privileges, and entirely dependent on the King's will.

The King, as I said, published a proclamation for apprehending all the conspirators against his life, among whom was his natural son, the Duke of Monmouth. The Duke had hitherto kept himself concealed. But at last weary of his uneasy situation, he writ a very submissive letter to the King his father, wherein, after positively denying his ever having any design against his life, he owned however, that many people had made him believe his own was in danger, and thereby caused him to commit things contrary to his duty to the King and the Duke of York, and asked both their pardons with great earnestness and submission. He added, that if his Majesty would give him his pardon, he would deliver himself into the hands of the Duke, that he might bring him to him. This was accompanied with protestations and assurances of respect, submission, and fidelity for the future. He concluded with saying, "That he would never ask to see the King's face more, if ever he did any thing against the Duke; which was the greatest curse he could lay upon himself."

The King could not dissimulate his satisfaction at the receipt of this letter, for he tenderly loved the Duke of Monmouth. Nevertheless, with his own hand he writ the following answer: "If the Duke of Monmouth desires to make himself capable of my mercy, he must render himself to the Secretary, and resolve to tell me all he knows, resigning himself entirely to my pleasure."

This drew a second letter from the Duke, more submissive than the former, in which he confessed his offence against the King and the Duke, but in general terms, and without mention of particulars (2). But in assuring the King of an unreferred submission to his pleasure, he intreated him, that he would not expose him to the ignominy of a trial, nor send him to the Tower, nor force him to be a witness against any person.

The King, satisfied with this letter, very readily admitted his beloved son to ask forgiveness. He was introduced by Secretary Jenkins, who withdrew, and left him alone with the King and the Duke of York. What passed between them, can only be known from the report of the King and the Duke's brother. It is however affirmed, that he threw himself at the King's feet, acknowledging his guilt (3), and asking his pardon; that he confessed himself faulty to the Duke, asking his pardon also. All this is very probable, but what is added admits of some doubt, namely, that he confirmed whatever had been deposed against the Lord Russell, and Colonel Sidney, and thereby corroborated the Lord Howard's evidence. It is also added, that he assured, all the considerable Non-conformist Ministers knew of the conspiracy. As this could only come from the King, or Duke of York, and as it was the interest of both, that the Earl of Essex, Lord Russell, and Colonel Sidney, should be thought guilty, all do not think themselves obliged to credit their testimony.

However this be, the King ordered his pardon to be dispatched with all expedition. But afterwards, upon a report, that the Duke of Monmouth had made no confession, but had asserted the innocency of some that had suffered, the King required him to write over, and subscribe the following letter:

"I Have heard of some reports of me, as if I should have lessened the late plot, and gone about to disfigure the evidence given against those who have died by justice. Your Majesty and the Duke know, how ingenuously I have owned the late conspiracy; and though I was not conscious of any design against your Majesty's life, yet I lament the having had so great a share in the other part of the said conspiracy. Sir, I have taken the liberty to put this in writing for my own vindication; and I beseech you to look forward, and endeavour to forget the faults you have forgiven me; I will take care never to commit any more against you, or come within the danger of being again misled from my duty, but make it the business of my life to deserve the pardon your Majesty hath granted to."

Your dutiful Monmouth.

It is certain, the Duke writ, or at least subscribed this letter, which, as it appears, was expressed in general terms, without descending to particulars. And yet, shortly after he repented of what he had done, and with great importunity pressed the King to return him the paper he had subscribed. The King answered him, he would not keep it against his will, that he might not have occasion to say, he had been forced to write it. But withal, he warned him to consider, what ill consequences might follow upon this obstinacy, and therefore gave him time till the next morning to deliberate with himself. The next day the Duke demanded his letter with still greater importunity, and the King restored it, but from that moment banished him from his presence at Court.

It is easy to see, that the motive which induced the Duke to demand his letter again, is a subject for conjecture, and difficult to be discovered. Some pretend, the Duke of Monmouth's friends represented to him, that by writing this letter, he had thrown himself upon an unavoidable precipice, since at some other time it might be turned to his ruin. Others maintain, that he was so troubled in conscience, for having asserted in this letter a thing which he knew to be false, that he was not easy till it was returned him. Each follows the opinion which is most agreeable to his system, but no proof is produced on either side. Lastly, there are who pretend, it was a contrivance between the King and the Duke of Monmouth, and that the King, not to disoblige the Duke of York, told, or ordered the Duke of Monmouth to be told, to demand his letter again, in order to have an opportunity to restore it, for fear the Duke of York might one day make an ill use of it. They confirm their conjecture from the King's behaviour to the Duke of Monmouth in his absence. The Duke withdrawing into Holland, and the Prince of Orange receiving him with great respect and civility, the King could not forbear testifying his satisfaction. He writ frequently to the Duke of Monmouth, received letters from him, unknown to the Duke of York, and privately supplied him with money.

The winter this year was very remarkable for a violent frost, which began about the beginning of December, and lasted till the 5th of February. The Thames was so frozen, that there was another City, as it were, on the ice, by the great number of booths erected between the Temple and Southwark, in which place was held an absolute fair, for above a fortnight, of all sorts of trades. An ox was likewise roasted whole, bulls baited, and the like.

In September or October this year, the King commissioned the Lord Dartmouth to go with about twenty sail of ships, and utterly demolish the town, castle, and mole of Tangier. The mole had cost the King vast sums, but for want of money or for some other cause was left unfinished. The Lord Dartmouth had also orders to choak up the haven. Six months were spent in executing this commission. The King was thereby freed from a considerable annual expence for the preservation of this place, and moreover, the Garrison, mostly consisting, as I observed, of Popish soldiers and officers, served to augment the King's forces at home, and keep in awe those who were impatient of the yoke.

This year 1683, was memorable for the famous siege of the Duke of York, who was knighted at the same time. His name was Edward, and he was the Duke of York's second son. He was born on the 15th of December, 1683. He was educated at the University of Cambridge, and was a member of the University of Oxford. He was a soldier, and was killed at the Battle of the Boyne in 1690. He was the Duke of York's second son, and was the Duke of York's second son.

1683. of Vienna, formed by the Grand Visier Kora Mustapha, the 9th of July, with an army of an hundred and thirty thousand men, and raised by the King of Poland, the second of September, when the City was reduced to the last extremity.

1683-4. The year 1684 was almost wholly spent in establishing the King's acquired absolute power. This was done chiefly by three expedients. The first was the augmentation of the Forces by the Garrison of Tangier: The second was the rigorous punishment of those who were not only accused of the Protestant Plot, but had during the quarrels between the King and the late Parliaments, taken the liberty to speak of the King and the Duke of York, with too much passion and heat. These Speeches, at a time when the King and the Duke were obliged to dissemble, for fear of further exasperating the Parliament, were now remembered, when they were in a more favorable situation, and the authors made to suffer. The third expedient was, the persuading indirectly all the Corporations in the Kingdom to surrender their Charters to the King. I have already said what I had to say concerning the garrison of Tangier.

As to the second expedient, I mean, the prosecutions against the King's and Duke's enemies, it would be tedious to enumerate all the trials and sentences given against those who were accused either of the last plot, or of having spoken too freely of the King and the Duke. Nothing else almost occurs in the events of the year 1684.

Since the City had lost their privileges, the King had nominated Sheriff: (1) entirely devoted to him, who took care in all criminal trials to impanel Juries, disposed to follow the suggestions of the Court. To facilitate the condemnation of those whose prosecutions were resolved, the King, in December last, had made Sir George Jeffries Lord Chief-Justice of the King's-Bench. He was a man fit for the purposes of the Court, without honour or conscience, impudent to the last degree, and ever ready to betray his duty and the interests of Justice and the Kingdom to recommend himself to those who were in power. These great qualities advanced him at last to the Chancellorship of England. The King had also made other alterations among the Judges, so that he was in a manner assured of the compliance of all the Courts of Justice. The Court-party had made a great noise some time before, concerning the Ignoramus returned by the London Juries upon all Bills preferred against the Whigs, and these complained no less of the rigour exercised this year by the Tories. Books have been published to shew the passion, the partiality, and the crying injustices of the Judges and Juries, in favour of the Court. But I cannot descend to these particulars, however proper they may be to demolish, with what zeal the Court promoted the execution of their designs, and to shew the characters of the persons employed. I shall therefore omit many trials of persons little known, and confine my self to some particular cases, by which the rest will be easily judged of.

The Earl of Danby had been sent to the Tower by the House of Lords, upon an impeachment from the Commons. He had often demanded to be discharged upon bail; but the Judges had always refused his request, declaring that it was not in their Power to admit to bail a Peer of the Realm imprisoned by parliament. This was the law of the Kingdom. But the alterations amongst the Judges had likewise produced great alterations in the maxims and principles of the Courts of Justice. The Judges who had been in office some time, believed it lawful to release the Earl upon bail, which was accordingly taken, the Earl being bound in a recognizance of ten thousand pounds.

The release of the Earl of Danby was a precedent for the liberty of the Popish Lords, prisoners in the Tower. The Lord Petre one of those Lords, dying about a month before upon his death-bed sent a letter to the King, disowning in his last words, and upon his Salvation, the matters of which he stood accused. After a declaration to express, the King not doubting the innocence of the other four, told the Court by his Attorney-General, that he consented to whatever the Court should think fit to be done with regard to the Popish Lords. Whereupon they were admitted to bail the same day with the Earl of Danby. It must be that the former Judges were very ignorant, not to know that an inferior Court had power to release men imprisoned by the supreme Court of the Kingdom, or that the present Judges were more bold than their predecessors.

But the persons accused of the last conspiracy, and those who had spoken disrespectfully of the King and the Duke, met not with so much humanity. Among the great number prosecuted for these two offences, I shall only relate 1683-4. the trials of three or four.

Mr. Hampden was tried for a conspirator the 6th of February. The Lord Howard deposed against him, That Mr. Hampden, the Council of six meeting at Mr. Hampden's house, Mr. Barne, Hampden made an introductory speech to open the Assembly, and that he was concerned in sending Aaron Smith into Scotland. Mr. Hampden's Counsel insisted upon Lord Howard's ill-reputation, and scandalous life, and repented him as little better than an Atheist. But such objections were of force only against Oates and Bedloe. For how was it possible that the Lord Howard should be an ill man, since he only deposed against Protestants? On the other hand, Mr. Hampden produced witnesses who testified his virtue, his piety, his morality. But these testimonies were ineffectual. Jeffries, in a long Speech, speaking of Religion and Virtue, turned it upon the prisoner in these words, "Was it not (said he) under the shape of Religion that the blessed Martyr King Charles I. came to the block? Nay some men were at a loss to know which way they should put a spirit into the common people to oppose the King; and some among them [Mr. Hampden the first] bid them be sure to put Religion to be the pretence, and that would make them run headlong to what they would have them." By this excellent argument, to be virtuous and religious, was a sign of a man's being engaged in the plot. But observe an artifice made use of to cast Mr. Hampden. It is certain, that, supposing the truth of Lord Howard's testimony, Mr. Hampden was not less guilty than Lord Russell or Colonel Sidney. Nevertheless he could not be condemned as a Traitor, since there was but one evidence against him, and all laws divine and human require two witnesses to the taking away a man's life. He was therefore indicted of a misdemeanour, and, the Jury finding him guilty on the testimony of Lord Howard, the Court was satisfied with fining him forty thousand pounds, and obliging him to find sureties for his good behaviour during life. This was thought to be a very strange and a severe sentence. But the King dispelled all doubts concerning this affair, by assuring the publick in a large Declaration, "That if he had not granted the Duke of Monmouth's request, That he would not make him a witness, neither Mr. Hampden, nor scarce any one man of those that were freed upon bail, had escaped death."

John Dutton Cole Esquire, a member of the three last Parliaments, being accused of speaking these words, The Duke of York is a Papist, and before any such Papist dog shall be successor to the Crown of England, I will be hanged at my own door. These and other injurious words being proved against him, the Jury brought in their verdict for the Duke of York, and gave him for damages a hundred thousand pounds.

The Duke of York also brought his action of Scandal against Titus Oates, for directly calling him Traytor. For this offence the Court gave the Duke of York a hundred thousand pounds damages. Shortly after, he was indicted for perjury, in relation to Father Ireland's being in London at the time Oates swore to, at his trial. Not long after another indictment of perjury was preferred against him, in relation to his being present at the supposed consult of the Jesuits at the White-Horse Tavern in 1678. But these indictments not being tried this Reign, Oates continued in prison.

These three, and some others (2), omitted for brevity sake, escaped with life, though properly condemned to perpetual imprisonment, as not being able to pay their exorbitant fines. But two others, who were out of the Kingdom, did not come off so easy. James Holloway having seen his name in the Gazette amongst the conspirators, who were to be apprehended by the King's proclamation, fled to the West-Indies. Upon his flight, he had suffered an Outlawry for High-Treason, and this year the Court hearing he was in the West-Indies, caused him to be apprehended and brought to London, where he was executed April 30, upon the attainer of Outlawry for treason.

The same thing happened to Sir Thomas Armstrong, who had been considered as one of the principal authors of the last plot, and named in the King's proclamation with a reward of five hundred pounds. He had made his escape into Holland, and was outlawed as well as Holloway. The Court, hearing he was at Leyden, obtained an order from the States to apprehend him, and accordingly before he had notice, he was apprehended and brought to Rotterdam, and from thence to London. When he appeared at the King's Bench Bar, he alleged that he was beyond sea at the time

But his request was absolutely rejected, and the rather, as the Attorney-General told the Court, from the King, that Armitage was one of the persons who were to assassinate his Majesty on his return from Newmarket, which the prisoner positively denied. He was executed the 20th of June, and his head and quarters set up in several parts of the City. Only one was referred to be sent down to Stafford, for which town he had been a Burgess in Parliament.

I do not think it necessary to relate the trials, this year, of a great number of Libellers, and persons who had spoken against the King, the Duke of York, or the Government. In Echard's History I find thirty two condemned in great fines, and some put in the Palory. The History of this year properly consists of such transactions only.

The whole Kingdom being struck with terror, the King believed he ought to improve it, to the establishment of his absolute power, so as to have nothing to fear from any future opposition. This was by depriving at once all the Corporations, and consequently all the Privileges. It was not proper to use absolute power, but to proceed in a manner more politic and more dangerous to the people, by engaging them to make a voluntary surrender of their Charters in order to receive such new ones as the King should please to grant. For this purpose, courtiers and emulraries were sent to the more considerable Corporations, to inspire them with terror, and intimate to them, that scarce one could escape, should the King exercise strict justice. This chiefly concerned the Whigs and Non-conformists, for the Tories were generally very ready blindly to obey the pleasure of the Court. Jaffies particularly distinguished himself in his Northern Circuit at the Summer-aises. He forgot nothing capable of terrifying the people, assuring them, that a surrender of their Charters was the only way to avert the mischiefs which hung over their head. Other Judges and emulraries did the same, and all the Corporations being thus gained, the lesser ones followed. So, when a great number was seen in England, namely, the English nation without Rights or Privileges, but such as the King would please to grant her; and what is more strange, the English themselves surrendered to Charles II. those very Rights and Privileges which they had defended with so much passion, or rather fury, against the attempts of Charles I.

To make the people in some measure fully sensible of their new slavery, the King affected to multer his forces, which from one regiment of Foot, and one troop of Horse-guards, (raised by himself, with the murmurs of many of his Subjects) were increased to four thousand completely trained and effective men. It might then be seen, that the members of Parliament who opposed the raising, or at least the establishment of these guards, were not altogether in the wrong. But the zeal of the Tory party was now arrived to such a height, that they looked on every thing which contributed to render the King absolute, as a sure means to ruin the Whigs, and consequently as a triumph for them. They preposterously imagined, that the Court only aimed at the destruction of that odious party, and was solely labouring for the Tories. Accordingly, we find still some authors of this last party who represent the year 1684 as the most peaceable, the most quiet, and, in a word, the happiest year England had seen for some ages. Nothing was capable to open the eyes of these passionate men, who, against all probability, believed the Court well-affected both to the State and the Protestant Religion.

Nevertheless, the King did a thing this year which ought to have undeceived them. He dissolved the Commission, granted in the year 1681, for the disposal of all Ecclesiastical preferments. As the establishing this Commission was in order to persuade his Subjects, that he had the interest of the Protestant Religion at heart, he could not avoid appointing such commissioners as were thought to have the same sentiments. But finding himself at length in the situation he had wished for, this Commission was too great a restraint, and therefore he revoked it to fill the vacant Benefices agreeably to his own inclinations.

It must not be concealed, that most Historians ascribe all the rigors exercised this year, and all the measures taken by the King for the advancement of his absolute power to the counsels of the Duke his brother. That Prince had gained so great an ascendancy over the King, that he held him in a kind of subjection, and led him into measures productive of others, and so carried him farther than the King desired. Besides, that the King was naturally indolent, and loved his ease too much to engage in any affairs capable of disturbing his repose, he knew the genius and temper of the English, much better than the Duke of York, and was sensible of the great difficulty to preserve long a power acquired in so extraordinary a manner. But, on the other hand, after so many proceedings to secure this power, he knew not how to retreat, and could not alter his conduct, without breaking entirely with the Duke, which must have extremely embarrassed him. He could not change his principles and maxims, without an entire alteration in his Court and Council, and without putting himself into the hands of men of very different principles. Besides, his inclination did not lead him to it, and it was only this fear of doubting his quiet, which caused him to consider the danger of his present proceedings. Mean while, as this danger was not yet near, and as all the Kingdom appeared submissive, he kept off the evil day, and delayed coming to any determination.

However this be, the Hamboorough company, to gain the good-will of a Prince, invested with such power, erected a marble Statue to him in the middle of the Royal Exchange, with this pompous inscription on the pedestal.

CAROLO II. Cæsari Britannicæ, Patriæ Patri, Regum Optimo, Clementissimo, Angulissimo, Generis humani Delicis, Utriusque Fortunæ Ictori, Pacis Europæ Arbitro, Maris Domino & Vincitori, Societatis Mercatorum Adventuræ, Angliæ, quæ per CCCC jam præpæ Anas Regia Benignitate floret, Fidei interemeratæ, Gratiitudinis Aiternæ, hoc Testimonium Venerabunda posuit, Anno sal. Humane, MDCLXXXIV (1).

Almost the whole month of January of the new year 1684-5, was spent either in prosecuting delinquents against the King and the Duke, or in receiving the Charters of the Corporations, not yet surrendered, or in granting new ones on such conditions as the Court thought proper. It may well be imagined, that these conditions were not prejudicial to the power acquired by the King. All complaints were suppressed, and the whole Kingdom entirely subdued, the city of London not excepted, which had always opposed absolute power.

The King now finding himself at the height of his wishes, was willing to do a popular act, and published a Declaration, drawn up by Dr. Sprat, in which, "he affectionately thanked his Subjects for their great confidence in him, chiefly for their so freely resigning their local Immunities and Charters into his hands, lest the abuse of any of them should hereafter prove dangerous to the just prerogatives of the Crown. This, he declared he esteemed as the peculiar honour of his reign, being such as none of the most popular of all his late royal predecessors could ever have hoped for. Wherefore he thought himself more than ordinarily obliged to continue, as he had hitherto begun, to shew the greatest moderation and benignity, in the exercise of so great a trust: Resolving upon this occasion, to convince the highest pretenders to the Commonwealth, that as the Crown was the first Original, so it was still the surest Guardian of all the people's lawful rights and privileges."

Notwithstanding all this, it is pretended, he had formed a project for an extraordinary change in the Government: That he designed to recall the Duke of Monmouth, to send the Duke of York beyond sea, and call a free Parliament. This seems to have been founded on some passages in the Duke of Monmouth's Pocket-book, seized with his person in the following reign. We are further told, that the King had intimated, that if he lived but a month longer, he would find a way to make himself easy for the rest of his life (2). But he lived not to execute this design. He died the 6th of February, fifty four years of age, and twenty five since his Restoration. The cause of his death being variously reported, some thinking it natural, others violent, I believe most instructive for the reader, what Dr. Welwood says of it, who seems to have spoken of it with most impartiality.

"It's confessed, few Princes come to die a sudden death, but the world is apt to attribute it to foul play; especially if attended with unusual circumstances in the time and manner of it."

"King Charles had a healthful constitution beyond most

1. The Duke of York resigned his place of Secretary of State, when he was succeeded by Sidney Godolphin, who was created

2. There was at this Time a new Scheme formed, that very probably would have been broken through by the Duke of Monmouth, Lord Sunderland, and Lord Godolphin were in it. The Duke of Monmouth went back very well pleased with his Journey. The Design was to begin with the Duke concerning his going to Spain: And he answered, there was no Occasion for that, as he himself would go thither. — The King was observed to be colder and more reserved, was still a deep Secrecy. Lord Hallifax was let into no Part of it. He complained of the King's name in the Books of the Treasury, and moved the King to go to the Treasury Chamber from Windsor, or come to Court that Day, when it was expected would prove a scandal. "men, and took great care to preserve it, by diet and exercise, which naturally promise a long life: And it was more extraordinary to see such a man die before threecore, than another in the bloom of youth. Now, if he died a natural death, it is agreed by all, that it must have been an Apoplexy. This disease seizes all the vital faculties at once; and yet, for the most part, does not only give some short warnings of its approach, by unusual affections of the head, but many times is occasioned by some evident preceding cause. In King Charles's case, there appeared no visible cause, either near or remote, to which, with any certainty of reason, his disease could be ascribed; and the fore-runners of it were rather to be found in his stomach and bowels, than in the head. For, after he was a bed, he was over-heard to groan most of the night: And both then, and next morning, before he fell into the fit, he complained first of a heavy oppression in his stomach and about his heart, and afterwards of a sharp pain in those parts; all which symptoms had but little relation to an apoplexy. That morning, there appeared to every body about him, a ghastliness and paleness in his looks: And when he sat down to be shaved, just before the fit took him, he could not sit straight, as he used to do, but continued in a stooping posture, with his hand upon his stomach, till the fit came. After he had been brought out of it, by opening a vein, he complained of a racking pain in his stomach, and of no indisposition any where else: And during the whole time of his sickness, and even when he seemed most insensible, he was observed to lay his hand, for the most part, upon his stomach, in a moaning posture, and continued so to his death: And so violent was the pain, that when all hopes were gone, the Physicians were desired to use all their art to procure him an easy death.

"So much for the distemper itself. There remains some things to be taken notice of, that fell out before and after his death. A few days before he was taken ill, King Charles being in company where the present posture of affairs was discoursed of, there escaped him some warm expressions, about the uneasy circumstances he was plunged into, and the ill-measures had been given him: And how, in a certain particular affair, he was pleased to mention, He had been abused; adding in some passion, That if he lived but a month longer, he would find a way to make himself easy for the rest of his life. This passage was whispered abroad next day; and the rumour of recalling the Duke of Monmouth, and sending away the Duke of York, came to take air about the same time. Indeed, all things were making ready, to put the latter in execution; and there is reason to believe, the King had intimated as much to the Duke himself; for some of his richest furniture was put up, and his chief servants ordered to be in a readiness to attend their master upon an hour's warning; and yachts were waiting, to transport some person of quality, without mentioning who it was, or whither bound. The Romish party that managed about Court, were observed to be more than ordinary diligent and busy up and down Whitehall and St. James's, as if some very important affair was in agitation; and a new and unusual concern was to be seen on their countenances. Nor was it any wonder, for in this suspected change, they were like to be the only losers, and all their teeming hopes were in a fair way to be disappointed. How far the principles of some of that party might leave them at liberty to push on their revenge for this designed affront, as well as to prevent the blow that threatened them, though without the privacy, much less the consent of the Duke of York, is left to the reader to judge.

"There was a foreign Minister, that some days before the King fell ill, ordered his Steward to buy a considerable parcel of black cloth, which served him and his retinue after for mourning: And the late Ambassador Don Pedro Ronquillo, made it no secret, that he had a letter from Flanders the week before King Charles died, that took notice of his death, as the news there. But both these might fall out by mere accident.

"There remain two things more that deserve some consideration in this matter. When his body was opened, there was not sufficient time given for taking an exact observation of his stomach and bowels; which, one would think, ought chiefly to have been done, considering the violent pains he had there: And when a certain Physician seemed to be more inquisitive than ordinary about the condition of those parts, he was taken aside, and reproved for his needless curiosity. In the next place, his body stunk so extremely, within a few hours after his death, notwithstanding the coldness of the season, that the people about him were extremely offended with the smell: Which is a thing very extraordinary, in one of "his strong and healthful constitution; and is not a proper consequent of a mere apoplectical distemper.

"There was some weight laid upon an accident that fell out at Windfor some years before his death: For the King drinking more liberally than usual, after the fatigue of riding, he retired to the next room, and wrapping himself up in his cloak, fell asleep upon a couch. He was but a little time come back to the company, when a servant belonging to one of them, lay down upon the same couch in the King's cloak, and was found stabbed dead with a poynard. Nor was it ever known how it happened, but the matter hushed up, and no enquiry made about it.

"To conclude, Dr. Short, who was a man of great probity and learning, and a Roman Catholic, made no scruple to declare his opinion to some of his intimate friends, that he believed King Charles had foul play done him: And when he came to die himself, expressed some suspicion that he had met with the same treatment, for opening his mind too freely in that point.

"So much for the circumstances of King Charles's death, that seem to have an ill-aspect. There are others, that seem to destroy all suspicion of treachery in the matter.

"As, first, He had lived so fast, as might enervate, in a great measure, the natural force of his constitution, and exhaust his animal spirits; and therefore he might be more subject to an apoplexy, which is a disease that weakens and locks up these spirits from performing their usual functions. And though, in his later years, he had given himself up more to the pleasures of wine, than of women; that might rather be the effect of age than of choice.

"Next, it is known, he had been once or twice attacked before, with fits that much resembled those of which he afterwards died: And yet, as the manner of them is told, they look rather to have been convulsive motions, than an apoplexy; seeing they were attended with violent contortions of his face, and convulsions of his whole body and limbs. This is the more confirmed, by a passage, that happened during the heat of the popish Plot. King Charles had some secret matters to manage at that time, by the means of a Romish Priest then beyond sea, whom he ordered to be privately sent for: And the Gentleman employed betwixt the King and him (from whom I had the story) was directed to bring him in a disguise to Whitehall. The King and the Priest were a considerable time together alone in the closet, and the Gentleman attended in the next room: At last, the Priest came out, with all the marks of fright and astonishment in his face; and having recovered himself a little, he told the Gentleman, that he had run the greatest risque ever man did; for while he was with the King, his Majesty was suddenly surprized with a fit, accompanied with violent convulsions of his body, and contortions of his face, which lasted for some moments; and when he was going to call out for help, the King held him by force till it was over, and then bid him not be afraid, for he had been troubled with the like before; the Priest adding, what a condition he should have been in, considering his Religion, and the present juncture of affairs, if the King had died of that fit, and no body in the room with him besides himself.

"But leaving this story to the credit of the Priest, there might be another natural cause assigned for King Charles's falling into such a fit as that of which he died, which is this; he had for some time an issue in his leg, which ran much, and consequently must have made a great revulsion from his head; upon which account, it is probable, it was made. A few weeks before his death, he had let it be dried up, contrary to the advice of his Physicians, who told him it would prejudice his health. Their prognostic was partly true in this, that there came a painful tumour upon the place where the issue had been, which proved very obstinate, and was not thoroughly healed up when he died.

"In fine, it is agreed on all hands, that King Charles expressed no suspicion of his being poisoned, during all the time of his sickness: Tho' it must be also observed, that the fits were so violent, that he could not speak while they were upon him, and shewed an aversion to speaking during the intervals. And there was not any thing to be seen, upon opening his body, that could reasonably be attributed to the force of poison. Yet, to allow these considerations no more weight than they can well bear, this must be acknowledged, that there are poisons which affect originally the animal spirits, and are of so subtle a nature, that they leave no concluding marks upon the bodies of those they kill."

Let us now see what Dr. Burnet says upon this subject, in his History of his own Times. As this History is not yet translated, 1684-5, translated, or at least published in French, I believe it will not be unacceptable to Foreigners, to insert here that famous Prelate's account of the death of Charles II.

Extract of
Dr. Burnet's History.
T. I. p. 606,

"All this winter the King looked better than he had done for many years. He had a humour in his leg, which looked like the beginning of the gout: So that for some weeks he could not walk, as he used to do generally, three or four hours a day in the Park; which he did commonly so fast that as it was really an exercise to himself, so it was a trouble to all about him to hold up with him. In the state the King was in, he not being able to walk, spent much of his time in his laboratory, and was running a process for the fixing of Mercury. On the first of February, being a Sunday, he eat little all day, and came to Lady Portsmouth at night, and called for a porringer of spoon-meat. It was made too strong for his stomach; so he eat little of it: And he had an unquiet night. In the morning one Dr. King, a Physician and a Chymist, came, as he had been ordered, to wait on him. All the King's discourse to him was so broken, that he could not understand what he meant. And the Doctor concluded, he was under some great disorder, either in his mind, or in his body. The Doctor, amazed at this, went out, and meeting with Lord Peterborough, he said, the King was in a strange humour, for he did not speak one word of sense. Lord Peterborough desired he would go in again to the Bed-chamber, which he did. And he was scarce come in, when the King, who seemed all the while to be in great confusion, fell down all of a sudden in a fit like an apoplexy: He looked black, and his eyes turned in his head. The Physician, who had been formerly an eminent Surgeon, said, it was impossible to save the King's life, if one minute was lost: He would rather venture on the rigour of the law, than leave the King to perish; and so he let him bleed. — The King came out of that fit, yet the effects of it hung still upon him, so that he was much oppressed. And the Physicians did very much apprehend the return of another fit, and that it would carry him off: So they looked on him as a dead man. The Bishop of London spoke a little to him, to dispose him to prepare for whatever might be before him; to which the King answered not a word. But that was imputed partly to the Bishop's cold way of speaking, and partly to the ill opinion they had of him at Court, as too busy in opposition to Popery. Sandercock made a very weighty exhortation to him; in which he used a good degree of freedom, which he said was necessary, since he was going to be judged by one who was no respecter of persons. To him the King made no answer neither; nor yet to Ken, though the most in favour with him of all the Bishops. Some imputed this to an infirmity, of which too visible an instance appeared, since Lady Portsmouth sat in the bed, taking care of him as a wife of a husband. Others guessed truer; that it would appear he was of another Religion. On Thursday a second fit returned. And then the Physicians told the Duke, that the King was not like to live a day to an end.

"The Duke immediately ordered Hudleston, the Priest that had a great hand in saving the King at Worcester fight, (for which he was excepted out of all severe acts that were made against Priests) to be brought to the lockings under the bed-chamber: And, when he was told what was to be done, he was in great confusion, for he had no Hystie about him. But he went to another Priest that lived in the Court, who gave him the Pix with an Hystie in it. But that poor Priest was so frightened, that he ran out of Whitehall in such haste, that he struck against a post, and seemed to be in a fit of madness with fear. As soon as Hudleston had prepared every thing that was necessary, the Duke whispered the King in the ear, upon that the King ordered, that all who was in the bed-chamber should withdraw, except the Earls of Bath and Feversham; and the door was double-locked. The company was kept out half an hour: Only Lord Feversham opened the door once, and called for a glass of water. Cardinal Howard told me at Rome, that Hudleston, according to the relation that he sent thither, made the King go through some acts of contrition, and, after such a confession as he could then make, he gave him absolution, and the other sacraments. The Hystie stuck in his throat: And that was the occasion of calling for a glass of water. He also gave him extreme Unction. All must have been performed very superstitiously, since it was so soon ended. But the King seemed to be at great ease upon it. It was given out, that the King said to Hudleston, that he had saved him twice, first his body and now his soul; and that he asked him, if he would have him declare himself to be of their Church. But it seems, he was prepared for this, and so

"diverted the King from it; and said, he took it upon 1684-5. him to satisfy the world in that particular. But though by the principles of all Religion whatsoever, he ought to have obliged him to make open profession of his Religion; yet, it seems, the consequences of that were apprehended; for, without doubt, that poor Priest acted by the directions that were given him. The company was suffered to come in. And the King went through the agonies of death, with a calm and a constancy, that amazed all who were about him, and knew how he had lived. This made some conclude, that he had made a Will, and that his quiet was the effect of that. Ken applied himself much to the awaking the King's conscience. He spoke with a great elevation, both of thought and expression, like a man inspired, as those who were present told me. He resumed the matter often, and pronounced many short ejaculations and prayers, which affected all that were present, except him that was the most concerned, who seemed to take no notice of him, and made no answers to him. He pressed the King six or seven times to receive the Sacrament; but the King always declined it, saying, he was very weak. A table with the elements upon it, ready to be consecrated, was brought into the room, which occasioned a report to be then spread about, that he had received it. Ken pressed him to declare, that he desired it, and that he died in the Communion of the Church of England. To that he answered nothing. Ken asked him, if he desired absolution of his sins. It seems the King, if he then thought any thing at all, thought that would do him no hurt. So Ken pronounced it over him: For which he was blamed, since the King expressed no sense, or sorrow for his past life, nor any purpose of amendment. It was thought to be a prostitution of the peace of the Church, to give it to one, who, after a life led as the King's had been, seemed to harden himself against every thing that could be said to him. Ken was also censured for another piece of indecency: He presented the Duke of Richmond, Lady Portsmouth's son, to be blessed by the King. Upon this, some that were in the room cried out, the King was their common father. And upon that all kneeled down for his blessing, which he gave them. The King suffered much inwardly, and said, he was burnt up within; of which he complained often, but with great decency. He said once, he hoped he should climb up to Heaven's gates, which was the only word favouring of Religion that he was heard to speak.

"He gathered all his strength to speak his last words to the Duke, to which every one hearkened with great attention. He expressed his kindness to him, and that he now delivered all over to him with great joy. He recommended Lady Portsmouth over and over again to him. He said, he had always loved her, and she loved her now to the last; and bequeathed the Duke, in as melting words as he could fetch out, to be very kind to her and to her son. He recommended his other children to him: And concluded, let not poor Nelly starve, that was Mrs. Guyn. But he said nothing of the Queen, nor any one word of his people, or of his servants: Nor did he speak one word of Religion, or concerning the payment of his debts, though he left behind him about ninety thousand guineas, which he had gathered either out of the Privy purse, or out of the money which was sent him from France, or by other methods, and which he had kept so secretly, that no person whatsoever knew any thing of it.

"He continued in the agony till Friday at eleven a clock, being the 6th of February 1684-5; and then died in the fifty fourth year of his age, after he had reigned, if we reckon from his father's death, thirty six years and eight days; or if we reckon from his Restoration, twenty four years, eight months, and nine days. There were many very apparent suspicions of his being poisoned: For though the first access looked like an apoplexy, yet it was plain in the progress of it, that it was no apoplexy. When his body was opened, the Physicians who viewed it, were, as it were, led by those, who might suspect the truth, to look upon the parts that were certainly found. But both Lower, and Needham, two famous Physicians, told me, they plainly discerned two or three blue spots on the out-side of the stomach. Needham called twice to have it opened, but the Surgeons seemed not to hear him. And when he moved it the second time, he, as he told me, heard Lower say to one that stood next him, Needham will undo us, calling thus to have the stomach opened; for he may see they will not do it: They were diverted to look to somewhat else: And when they returned to look upon the stomach it was carried away: So that it was never viewed. Le Fevre a French Physician, told me, 1684-5.

"he saw a blackness in his shoulder : Upon which he made an incision, and saw it was all mortified. Short, another Physician, who was a Papist, but after a form of his own, did very much suspect foul dealing. And he had talked more freely of it, than any of the Protestants durst do at that time. But he was not long after taken suddenly ill, upon a large draught of Worm-wood-wine, which he had drunk in the house of a popish Patient that lived near the Tower, who had sent for him, of which he died ; and, as he said to Lower, Milington, and some other Physicians, he believed that he himself was poisoned for his having spoken so freely of the King's death.

"The King's body was indecently neglected ; some parts of his inwards, and some pieces of the fat, were left in the water in which they were washed : All which were so carelessly looked after, that the water being poured out at a scullery hole, that went to a drain, in the mouth of which a grate lay, these were seen lying on the grate many days after. His funeral was very mean. He did not lye in state ; no mournings were given : And the expence of it was not equal to what an ordinary Nobleman's funeral will rise to. Many upon this said, that he better deserved from his brother, than to be thus ungratefully treated in ceremonies that are publick, and that make an impression on those who see them, and who will make severe observations and inferences upon such omiffions.

"But since I have mentioned the suspicions of poison as the cause of his death, I must add, that I never heard any lay those suspicions on his brother. But his dying so critically, as it were in the minute in which he seemed to begin a turn of affairs, made it to be generally the more believed, and that the Papists had done it, either by the means of some of Lady Portsmouth's servants, or, as some fancied, by poisoned snuff : For so many of the small veins of the brain were burst, that the brain was in great disorder, and no judgment could be made concerning it. To this I shall add a very surprising story, that I had in November 1709, from Mr. Henly of Hampshire. He told me, that, when the Duchess of Portsmouth came over to England in 1699, he heard, that she talked as if King Charles had been poisoned ; which he desired to have from her own mouth, he gave him this account of it. She was always pressing the King to make both himself and his people easy, and to come to a full agreement with his Parliament : And he was come to a final resolution of sending away his brother, and of calling a Parliament ; which was to be executed the next day, after he fell into that fit of which he died. She was put upon the secret, and spoke of it to no person alive but to her Confessor : But the Confessor, she believed, told it to some, who seeing what was to follow, took that wicked course to prevent it. Having this from so worthy a person, as I have set it down without adding the least circumfance to it, I thought it too important not to be mentioned in this History. It discovers both the knavery of Confessors, and the practices of Papists so evidently, that there is no need of making any further reflections on it."

Remark.

"These two relations of the death of King Charles II. agree in the principal circumstances, particularly in the suspicion of his being poisoned. Several other accounts have been given of his death, in which are inserted circumstances not to be met with here, and others omitted which are here related. It is said, that at the perswasion of Bishop Ken, the King at last resolved to dismiss the Duchess of Portsmouth, and sending for the Queen, asked her pardon for the injury he had done her. It is added, that he had the satisfaction of her particular forgiveness. This directly contradicts Dr. Burnet's account of the Duchess of Portsmouth. Some say, Hudleston was not brought to the King till he had lost all sense, and that he received the Sacrament of extreme Unction, without giving the least sign either of his approbation or refusal. It is pretended, he advised the Duke his brother, not to think of introducing Popery into England, because it was an impracticable undertaking. Lastly, some say only, that the Physicians and Surgeons inspecting the body, discovered no mark of poison, and entirely omit the circumstances of the stomach, mentioned in the two foregoing relations, though they own the suspicion of the King's being poisoned, but represent this suspicion as coming from the enemies of the Duke, and of the Papists.

"It is universally agreed, that no man had the boldness to accuse the Duke of poisoning his brother. But it is not to be concluded from thence, that no man believed it. Those who might have entertained this suspicion, took care not to expose themselves to a danger so great as that of accusing the Successor, without being able to prove it. The Papists in general are accused, but this is so undeterminate a word, that one knows not to whom to apply it, when they are separated from the Duke of York's head. Besides, the inspection of the dead body was managed in a proper way to dispel all suspicions of poison ; but who directed the Physicians or Surgeons is a secret, at least the brother of the deceased does not appear to have concerned himself much in this inspection, though the suspicions of poison were very violent. All this creates such an obscurity as gives every man room to judge as he pleases. Thus much is certain, there is no formal proof that King Charles II. was poisoned, or if he was, the authors of his death remain hitherto concealed.

A Remark on the Character of Charles II.

"It is not very strange that the Historians or others, should disagree in their character of Charles II. when it is considered, that he was the head and protector of one of the two parties, and the persecutor of the other. This must have necessarily produced a diversity of characters, according as they are given by Tories or Whigs. When we read successively the writers of the two parties, who have spoken of this Prince in general, or given his character, we are almost apt to think, they speak of two different Kings of the same name. The one by several omiffions endeavour to cover all his faults, or if they are mentioned, 'tis very slightly, and always with some addition or insinuation tending to justify them. The others insist chiefly upon what may blacken his character, and shew, that he acted upon very ill motives, and upon principles directly contrary to the good of the Kingdom. If they speak of his good qualities, it is only to render him more faulty, and demonstrate that he transgressed not through ignorance, but with premeditation. Which ever way I take to draw the character of this Prince, I cannot avoid the censure of one or the other party, if I speak as from my self, and I should not gain much in going upon the testimony of either party. However, as the reader, doubtless, expects to know something more of the character of this King than could be learnt from the history of his reign, I chuse to insert Dr. Burnet's account in the History of his own Times. I own this, of all the characters of Charles II. seems to me, in the whole, to be most like, and most agreeable to the history of his life. I could wish however, this illustrious Prelate had omitted, or at least softened some strokes, which appear to me a little over-charged, and seem to discover some passion in the author. However that be, he concludes the history of this Prince in the following manner :

"Thus lived and died King Charles the second. He was the greatest instance in History of the various revolutions of which any one man seemed capable. He was bred up the first twelve years of his life with the splendour that became the heir of so great a Crown. After that he passed through eighteen years in great inequalities, unhappy in the war, in the loss of his father, and of the Crown of England. Scotland did not only receive him, though upon terms hard of digestion, but made an attempt upon England for him, though a feeble one. He lost the battle of Worcester with too much indifference : and then he shewed more care of his person than became one, who had so much at stake. He wandered about England for ten weeks after that, hiding from place to place. But under all the apprehensions he had then upon him, he shewed a temper so careless, and so much turned to levity, that he was then diverting himself with little household sports, in as unconcerned a manner as if he had made no loss, and had been in no danger at all. He got at last out of England. But he had been obliged to so many, who had been faithful to him and careful of him, that he seemed afterwards to resolve to make an equal return to them all. And finding it not easy to reward them all as they deserved, he forgot them all alike. Must Princes seem to have this pretty deep in them ; and to think that they ought never to remember past services, but that their acceptance of them is a full reward. He of all in our age, exerted this piece of prerogative in the amplest manner : for he never seemed to charge his memory, or to trouble his thoughts with the sense of any of the services that been done him. While he was abroad at Paris, Colen, or Brussels, he never seemed to lay any thing to heart. He pursued all his diversions and irregular pleasures in a free career ; and seemed to be as serene under the loss of a Crown as the greatest Philosopher could have been. Nor did he willingly hearken to any of those projects, with which he often complained that his Chancellor persecuted him. That in which he seemed most concerned was, to find money for supporting his expence. And it was often said, that if Cromwell would have compounded the matter, and have given him a good round pension, that he might have been induced to resign his title to him. During his exile he delivered himself so entirely up to his pleasures, that he became incapable of application. He spent little of his time in reading, or study, and yet less in thinking. And in the state his affairs were then in, he accustomed himself to say to every person 1684-5. " person, and upon all occasions, that which he thought would please most : so that words or promises went very easily from him. And he had so ill an opinion of mankind, that he thought the great art of living and governing was, to manage all things and all persons with a depth of craft and dissimulation. And in that, few men in the world could put on the appearances of sincerity better than he could : Under which so much artifice was usually hid, that in conclusion he could deceive none, for all were become mistrustful of him. He had great vices, but scarce any virtues to correct them. He had in him some vices that were less hurtful, which corrected his more hurtful ones. He was, during the active part of life, given up to sloth and lewdness to such a degree, that he hated business, and could not bear the engaging in any thing that gave him much trouble, or put him under any constraint. And though he desired to become absolute, and to overturn both our Religion and our Laws, yet he would neither run the risk, nor give himself the trouble, which so great a design required. He had an appearance of gentleness in his outward deportment : but he seemed to have no bowels nor tenderness in his nature : and in the end of his life he became cruel. He was apt to forgive all crimes even blood itself : Yet he never forgave any thing that was done against himself, after his first and general Act of Indemnity, which was to be reckoned as done rather upon maxims of State, than inclinations of mercy. He delivered himself up to a most enormous course of vice, without any sort of restraint, even from the consideration of the nearest relations ; the most studied extravagancies that way seemed to the very last to be much delighted in, and pursued by him. He had the art of making all people grow fond of him at first, by a softness in his whole way of conversation, as he was certainly the best bred man of the age. But when it appeared how little could be built on his promise, they were cured of the fondness that he was apt to raise in them. When he saw young men of quality, who had something more than ordinary in them, he drew them about him, and set himself to corrupt them both in Religion and morality ; in which he proved so unhappily successful, that he left England much changed at his death, from what he had found it at his Restoration. He loved to talk over all the stories of his life to every new man that came about him. His stay in Scotland, and the share he had in the war of Paris, in carrying messages from the one side to the other, were his common topics. He went over these in a very graceful manner ; but so often, and copiously, that all those who had been long accustomed to them grew weary of them. And when he entered on those stories, they usually withdrew : So that he often began them in a full audience, and before he had done, there were not above four or five left about him ; which drew a severe jest from Milfort Earl of Rochester. He said, " He wondered to see a man have so good a memory, as to repeat the same story without losing the least circumstance and yet not remember that he had told it to the same persons the very day before. This made him fond of strangers ; for they hearkened to all his often-repeated stories, and went away as in a rapture, at such an uncommon condescension in a King.

" His person and temper, his vices as well as his fortune resemble the character that we have given us of Tiberius, so much, that it were easy to draw a parallel between them. Tiberius's banishment, and his coming afterwards to reign, makes the comparison in that respect come pretty near. His hating of business, and his love of pleasures, his raising of Favorites, and trusting them entirely, and his pulling them down, and hating them excessively ; his art of covering deep designs, particularly of revenge, with an appearance of softness, brings them so near a likeness, that I did not wonder much to observe the resemblance of their face and person. At Rome I saw one of the last Statues made for Tiberius after he had lost his teeth. But, bating the alteration which that made, it was so like King Charles that Prince Borghese and Signior Dominico to whom it belonged, did agree with me in thinking that it looked like a statue made for him.

" Few things ever went near his heart ; the Duke of Gloucester's death seemed to touch him much. But those who knew him best thought it was, because he had lost him, by whom only he could have balanced the surviving Brother, whom he hated, and yet embroiled all his affairs to preserve the succession to him.

" His ill conduct in the first Dutch war, and those terrible calamities of the Plague, and Fire of London, with that loss and reproach which he suffered by the insult at Chatham, made all people conclude, there was a curse upon his Government. His throwing the publick hatred at that time upon Lord Clarendon, was both unjust and ungrateful. And when his people had brought him out of all his difficulties, upon his entering into the Triple-alliance, his selling that to France, and his entering on the second Dutch war with as little colour as he had for the first ; his beginning it with the attempt on the Dutch Smyna fleet ; the shutting up the Eschequer ; and his declaration for toleration, which was a step for the introduction of Popery ; make such a chain of black actions flowing from blacker designs, that it amazed those who had known all this, to see with what impudent strains of flattery addresses were penned during his life, and yet more grossly after his death. His contributing so much to the raising the greatness of France, chiefly at sea, was such an error, that it could not flow from want of thought or of true sense. Rouvigny told me, he desired that all the methods the French took in the increase and conduct of their naval force might be sent him. And, he said, he seemed to study them with concern and zeal. He shewed what errors they committed, and how they ought to be corrected, as if he had been a Viceroy to France, rather than a King that ought to have watched over, and prevented the progress they made, as the greatest of all the mischiefs that could happen to him or to his people. They that judged the most favorable of this, thought it was done out of revenge to the Dutch, that, with the assistance of so great a fleet as France could join to his own, he might be able to destroy them. But others put a worse construction on it ; and thought, that seeing he could not quite master or deceive his subjects by his own strength and management, he was willing to help forward the greatness of the French at sea, that by their assistance he might more certainly subdue his own people ; according to what was generally believed to have fallen from Lord Clifford, " That if the King must be in a dependence, it was better to pay it to a great and generous King, than to five hundred of his own insolent Subjects. No part of his character looked wicked as well as meaner, than that he, all the while that he was professing to be of the Church of England, expressing both zeal and affection to it, was yet secretly reconciled to the Church of Rome : Thus mocking God, and deceiving the world with so gross a prevarication. And his not having the honesty or courage to own it at the last : His not shewing any sign of the least remorse for his ill led life, or any tenderness either for his subjects in general, or for the Queen and his Servants : And his recommending only his Mistresses and their Children to his brother's care, would have been a strange conclusion to any other life, but was well enough suited to all the other parts of his.

" The two papers found in his strong-box concerning Religion, and afterwards published by his brother, looked like study and reasoning. Tenison told me, he saw the original in Pepys's hand, to whom King James trusted them for some time. They were interlined in several places. And the interlinings seemed to be writ in a hand different from that in which the papers were writ. But he was not so well acquainted with the King's hand, as to make any judgment in the matter, whether they were writ by him or not. All that knew him when they read them, did, without any sort of doubting, conclude, that he never composed them : For he never read the Scriptures, nor laid things together, further than to turn them to a jest, or for some lively expression. These papers were probably writ either by Lord Bristol, or by Lord Aubigny, who knew the secret of his Religion, and gave him those papers, as abstracts of some discourses they had with him on those heads, to keep him fixed to them. And it is very probable, that they, apprehending their danger, if any such papers had been found about him writ in their hand, might prevail with him to copy them out himself, though his laziness that way made it certainly no easy thing to bring him to give himself so much trouble. He had talked over a great part of them to myself : So that as soon as I saw them, I remembered his expressions, and perceived that he had made himself master of the argument, as far as those papers could carry him. But the publishing them shewed a want of judgment, or of regard to his memory in those who did it : For the greatest kindness that could be shewn to his memory, would have been, to let both his papers and himself be forgotten."

After seeing in this character, all that can be said to the disadvantage of Charles II., the Reader doubtless will not be displeased to behold the picture of the same Prince, drawn a little differently by a very able hand, I mean [John Sheffield] Earl of Mulgrave, who was no enemy to the King, or the Royal Family. He has laboured this description with all possible care. I omit a short introduction concerning the Author, to come at once to the character of the King.

" As to the King's Religion, it was more Deism than Backing-Popery ; which he owed more to the liveliness of his

"parts, and carelessness of his temper, than either to reading, or much consideration; for his quickness of apprehension, at first view, could discern through the several cheats of pious pretences; and his natural laziness confirmed him in an equal mistrust of them all, for fear he should be troubled with examining which Religion was best. If in his early travels, and late administration, he seemed a little biased to one sort of Religion; the first it is only to be imputed to a certain easiness of temper, and a complaisance for that company he then was forced to keep; and the last was no more than his being tired, (which he soon was in any difficulty,) with those bold oppositions in Parliament, which made him almost throw himself into the arms of a Roman Catholic party, so remarkable in England for their loyalty, who embraced him gladly, and lulled him asleep with those enchanting songs of absolute Sovereignty, which the best and wisest of Princes are often unable to resist. And though he engaged himself on that side more fully, at a time when it is in vain, and too late to dissemble, we ought less to wonder at it, than to consider that our very judgments are apt to grow in time as partial as our affections: And thus, by accident only, he became of their opinion in his weakness, who had so much endeavoured always to contribute to his power. He loved ease and quiet; to which his unnecessary wars are so far from being a contradiction, that they are rather a proof of it, since they were made chiefly to comply with those persons, whose dissatisfaction would have proved more uneasy to one of his humour, than all that distant noise of cannon, which he would often listen to with a great deal of tranquillity. Besides, the great and almost only pleasure of mind he appeared addicted to, was shipping and sea-affairs; which seemed to be so much his talent both for knowledge as well as inclination, that a war of that kind was rather an entertainment, than any disturbance to his thoughts. If he did not go himself at the head of so magnificent a fleet, it is only to be imputed to that eagerness of military glory in his brother; who, under the shew of a decent care for preserving the royal person from danger, engrossed all that sort of honour to himself, with as much jealousy of any other's interposing in it, as a King of another temper would have had of his, though without reason. It is certain, no Prince was ever more fitted by nature for his Country's interest, than he was in all his maritime inclinations; which might have proved of sufficient advantage to this nation, if he had been as careful in depressing all such improvements in France, as of advancing and encouraging our own: But it seems he wanted jealousy in all his inclinations, which leads us to consider him in his pleasures: Where he was rather abandoned than luxurious; and like our female Libertines, apter to be debauched for the satisfaction of others, than to seek with choice, where most to please himself. I am of opinion also, that in his latter time, there was as much of laziness as of love, in all those hours he passed among his mistresses; who, after all, served only to fill up his Seraglio, while a bewitching kind of pleasure, called Santerring, and talking without any constraint, was the true Sultana Queen he delighted in.

"He was surely inclined to justice; for nothing else would have retained him so fast to the succession of a brother, against a son he was so fond of, and the humour of a party which he so much feared. I am willing also to impute to his justice, whatever seems in some measure to contradict the general opinion of his clemency; as his suffering always the rigour of the law to proceed, not only against all Highwaymen, but also several others, in whose cases the Lawyers, (according to their wonted custom) had used sometimes a great deal of hardship and severity. His understanding was quick and lively in little things, and sometimes would soar high enough in great ones, but unable to keep it up with any long attention or application. Witty in all sorts of conversation; and telling a story so well, that not out of flattery, but for the pleasure of hearing it, we used to seem ignorant of what he had repeated to us ten times before, as a good comedy will bear the being seen often. Of a wonderful mixture; losing all his time, and till of late letting his whole heart on the fair sex, yet neither angry with rivals, nor in the least nice as to their being beloved; and while he sacrificed all things to his mistresses, he would use to grudge and be uneasy at their losing a little of it again at play, though never so necessary for their diversion: Nor would he venture five pounds at Tennis to those servants, who might obtain as many thousands, either before he came thither, or as soon as he left off. Not false to his word,

"but full of dissimulation, and very afraid of a man easier to be imposed on; for his great in covering himself, yet being so much so, it cost him ten times as much another's as those persons most, who had deluded him the oft; and yet the quickest in the world at spying such a riddle in another. Familiar, easy, and good-natured; but for great offences severe and inflexible: Also in one week's absence, quite forgetting those servants, to whose faces he could hardly deny any thing. In the midst of all his remissness, so industrious and indefatigable on some particular occasions, that no man would either toil longer, or be able to manage it better.

"He was so liberal, as to ruin his affairs by it; for want in a King of England, turns things just upside down, and exposes a Prince to his people's mercy. It did yet worse in him, for it forced him also to depend on his great neighbour of France; who played the brother with him sufficiently in all those times of extremity. Yet this profuseness of his did not so much proceed from his over-valuing those he favoured, as from his undervaluing any sums of money which he did not see; though he found his error in this, but I confess a little of the lack. He had so natural an aversion to all formality, that with as much wit as most Kings ever had, and with as majestic a mien, yet he could not on premeditation act the part of a King for a moment, either at Parliament, or at Council, either in words or gesture; which carried him into the other extreme, more inconvenient of the two, of letting all distinction and ceremony fall to the ground, as useless and superfluous. His temper, both of body and mind, was admirable, which made him an easy generous lover, a civil obliging husband, a friendly brother, an indulgent father, and a good-natured master. If he had been as solicitous about improving the faculties of his mind, as he was in the management of his bodily health; though, alas! the one proved unable to make his life long, the other had not failed to have made it famous. He was an illustrious exception to all the common rules of Physiognomy: For, with a most Saturnine harsh sort of countenance, he was both of a merry and merciful disposition; and in the last thirty years of his life, as fortunate, as those of his Father had been dismal and tumultuous.

"If his death has been by some suspected of being untimely, it may be partly imputed to his extreme healthy constitution, which made the world as much surprized at his dying before threescore, as if nothing but an ill accident could have killed him. I would not say any thing on so sad a subject, if I did not think silence itself would in such a case signify too much; and therefore, as an impartial writer, I am obliged to observe, that the most knowing, and most discerning of his Physicians [Doctor Short] did not only believe him poisoned, but thought himself so too not long after, for having declared his opinion a little too boldly. But here I must needs take notice of an unusual piece of justice, which yet all the world has almost unanimously agreed in; I mean, in not suspecting his successor of the least complicity in so horrid a villainy; and perhaps there was never a more remarkable instance of the wonderful power of truth and innocence: For it is next to a miracle, that so unfortunate a Prince, in the midst of all those disadvantages he lies under, should be yet cleared of this, even by his greatest enemies; notwithstanding all those circumstances that used to give a suspicion, and that extreme malice which has of late attended him in all his other actions" (1).

After giving these different characters of King Charles II, A Comparison drawn by such able hands, I think my self obliged to make ^{in between} a sort of parallel, in order to assist the reader in the discovery of the truth. Dr. Burnet Bishop of Salisbury was a ^{going Charles} Scotchman. He had been educated amongst the Episcopalians, but however, was always accused of preserving a tincture of Presbyterianism, the Religion of his Country, when free to pursue its inclination. He is likewise accused of having been entirely in the Whig party. In short, he had no reason to be pleased with either Charles II, or James II, and therefore we must read with caution whatever he says, not reconcilable with the known actions of Charles II, or expressly contradicted by others.

It is not difficult to discover, that Burnet's picture of Charles II. is very much charged. The painter has strongly drawn all the lines, which he thought might beget a likeness between the picture and the original, without any regard to the reputation of this Prince. It is even seen, that possibly he spoke with prejudice, and by this prejudice, was led to credit too lightly what he had received upon hearsay to the King's disadvantage. For instance, what he affirms, that Charles, after the battle of Worcester, showed a temper so careless, that he was then diverting himself with trifles in as unconcerned a manner, as if he had sustained no loss, and been in no danger at all, appears to me a little aggravated. It is not even probable, that the Bishop could be informed of the King's actions at that time, by eye-witnesses. When he says, the King had great vices, but scarce any virtues to correct them, this plainly appears to be the language of passion and prejudice. When he says again, the King never forgave any thing that was done against himself, this must be aggravated. For if he was merciful to the Lord Ruffel, Colonel Sidney, Sir Thomas Armstrong, and some others, it cannot from thence be inferred, that he never forgave. Such expressions excepted, which discover some passion in the author, the rest of Charles II's character is true in general. This I believe, because I find it agreeable to the history of his reign, and because the Earl of Mulgrave has in his picture drawn the same lines with Dr. Burnet, to express his likeness. All the difference between these two authors, is, that in the Bishop's picture, the principal lines are strongly expressed, and much softened in the Earl's.

The Earl of Mulgrave, afterwards Marquis of Normandy, and then Duke of Buckinghamshire, was entirely in the Tory-party, and if common report may be credited, his Religion, like that of Charles II, was Deism. In his description of this Prince, he denies not the general suspicion of his being poisoned. Burnet says also the same thing. The Earl insists that the Duke of York was not suspected of the least connivance at so horrid a villany. The same Charles was a Papist, this is not denied by the Earl. He only imputes it to two causes, first, to a complaisance for the company he was forced to keep in his exile; and secondly, to the opposition he met with in Parliament, which threw him into the arms of the Papists. If the first of these causes be true, the second cannot be so, since the King was not twice a Papist. Besides, the oppositions in Parliament were partly owing to a belief, that he designed to introduce Popery.

Burnet says, Charles was incapable of any application. The Earl says the same. The History of the King was for rendering himself absolute. If the Earl says it not in express terms, he sufficiently intimates it, by saying, That the Roman Catholic party lulled him asleep with the enchanting songs of Sovereignty and Prerogative. Burnet says, the King was apt to forgive all crimes, but never forgave any thing that was done against himself. The Earl praises his clemency, and says, he was easy and good-natured in trifles, but in great affairs severe and inflexible. This may be the Bishop's meaning expressed in other words.

The stories which the King loved to talk over, are in both characters. The only difference is, that Burnet says, the company grew weary of them, and the Earl says, the hearers were pleased with the repetition. But the railery of the Earl of Reichster turns the balance for the Bishop.

Burnet says, Charles engaged in two wars against Holland, without any colour, and the Earl calls these wars unnecessary.

Burnet says, he contributed to the raising of the greatness of France at sea, and the Earl says, he was not sufficiently careful to depress the maritime improvements of France, and that here he wanted jealousy. Is not this much the same thing?

In short, let these two pictures be compared with all possible exactness, and they will both be found very like; but that the two painters had different views, and pursued different methods. The one proposed to express strongly the lines which might most contribute to a resemblance with the original, without regarding the beauty of the picture in itself. The other, without omitting the same lines, which could not be done and the likeness preserved, has taken all possible care to soften them, in order to hide, as much as lay in his power, the deformities of the original. In a word, the one has given us an ugly, and the other a beautiful likeness. This doublet, induced the Earl to suppress several strokes of his pencil, which might have improved the resemblance, but would have been prejudicial to the end he proposed in his work (1).

(1) I. King Charles II, left no issue by his Queen, Dona Catherine, daughter of John IV, King of Portugal. But by his several Mistresses, he had the following Children.

1. By Mrs. Lucy Walters, Daughter of Richard Walters, Esq; James Duke of Monmouth, born at Rotterdam, April 9, 1649. beheaded on Tower, July 15, 1685. He married in 1665, Anne Scott, Daughter of Francis Earl of Buckleigh in Scotland.

2. By Mrs. Elizabeth Killigrew, Viscountess Sidney, Daughter of Sir William Killigrew, Charles-James-Henrietta-Maria Fitz-roy, who died in 1684. Her Relations were, James Howard, and Sir William Paffin Earl of Yarmouth.

3. By Mrs. Catherine Peg, Daughter of Thomas Peg, Esq; Charles Fitz-Charles Earl of Plymouth, commonly called Don Carlos, born 1658, killed October 17, 1680, at Tangier. He married Bridge Daughter of Sir Thomas Osborne Duke of Leeds, who married afterwards Dr. Bishop the late Bishop of Hereford.

4. By Mrs. Barbara Villiers, Heiress of William Viscount Grandison in Ireland, and Wife of Roger Palmer Earl of Cottenham, created Lady Nonfuch, Countess of Sunderland, and Duchess of Cleveland, who died in 1709, he had three Sons, and three Daughters. 1. Charles Fitz-Roy, born 1662, created 1675, Duke of Sunderland, and after his Mother's Death Duke of Cleveland. His Wives were Mary Daughter of Sir Henry Wood, and Alice Daughter of Sir William Paulet. 2. Henry Fitz-Roy Duke of Grafton, born September 20, 1663, and killed October 9, 1690, at the siege of Cornwall in Ireland. His Wife was Isabella Daughter of Henry Bruce Earl of Arundel, married after his Death to Sir Thomas Hunter Bart. 3. George Fitz-Roy Duke of Norfolk, born December 28, 1665, who died July 8, 1716, without Children. 4. John Fitz-Roy born Feb. 29, 1661, married in 1684, to Frances daughter of James Earl of Suffolk. 5. Charlotte Fitz-Roy, born September 5, 1664, married February 20, 1696, to Sir Edward Henry Lee Earl of Litchfield, Lord of Suffolk.

6. Barbara born July 16, 1672, who became a Nun at Pontefract in France.

7. By Mrs. Elizabeth Guin, 1. Charles Beauclerk Duke of St. Albans, born May 8, 1670, who married Diana Vere, eldest Daughter and Co-heiress of Abney de Vere, the 20th and last Earl of Oxford. 2. James Beauclerk born December 25, 1671. He died in 1680 in France.

8. By Louise de Maréville Duchess of Perth, 1. Charles Louis Duke of Richmond and Lennox, born July 29, 1671, who died May 27, 1723. His Wife was Ann, eldest Daughter of Francis Lord Blandford.

9. By Mrs. Mary Davis, Mary Tudor, born October 16, 1673, married in August 1687, to Francis Lord Ratcliff Earl of Downwater. See Sandford, p. 639, &c.

WITHIN a few hours after Charles II. had resigned his last breath, his brother the Duke of York was proclaimed King in London, by the name of JAMES II. Having seen how the Government was settled for some years past, we must not think it strange, there was no endeavors, either in London or any other part of the Kingdom, to oppose the new King. Of the two parties in England, that against the Bill of Exclusion was triumphant, and the other entirely broken and oppressed. The accession of James II. to the Crown, was a fresh occasion of triumph to the former, and notwithstanding the fears expressed by the other party, about a Catholic Successor, they who had supported his interests, endeavoured to represent the late change, as the greatest of blessings to the English nation. The King, on his part, omitted nothing that lay in his power to confirm the good opinion his friends had of his virtue and sincerity. As soon as the Lords were returned to Whitehall, from proclaiming the King, he assembled the Privy-Council, and made the following Speech:

My Lords,

BEFORE I enter upon any other business, I think fit to say something to you. Since it hath pleased Almighty God to place me in this station, and I am now to succeed to good and gracious a King, as well as so very kind a brother, I think it fit to declare to you, that I will endeavour to follow his example, and most especially in that of his great clemency and tenderness to his People. I have been reported to be a man for arbitrary Power; but that is not the only story has been made of me; and I shall make it my endeavour to preserve this Government both in Church and State, as it is now by law established. I know the principles of the Church of England are for Monarchy, and the members of it have shewed themselves good and loyal Subjects, therefore I shall always take care to defend and support it. I know too, that the laws of England are sufficient to make the King as great a Monarch as I can wish; and as I shall never depart from the just Rights and Prerogative of the Crown, so I shall never invade any man's property. I have often heretofore ventured my life in defence of this Nation, and I shall still go as far as any man in preserving it in all its just Rights and Liberties.

This Speech being addressed to a Council wholly composed of persons devoted to the King, was received with great applause. His Majesty was desired that it might be printed, and dispersed among the people, which was immediately done. Moreover, great care was taken to extol the King's extreme affection for his subjects; and, above all, his strict observance of his word and faith was so industriously propagated, that some counting it impossible for the King to promise what he did not intend to perform, began to give him the name of James the Just, as if to say and to do, were in him one and the same thing.

The next day, the King published a proclamation, declaring, that all persons who at the late King's decease were possessed of any office, should be continued in the same, until the King's pleasure was further known. He declared, moreover, that all orders and directions given by the late King's Privy Council, should be obeyed and performed, as if he were still alive. This is a clear evidence of the great influence that the King, when Duke of York, had in the counsels of the King his brother. Upon his accession to the Crown, he made no change, either in the Council, or in the chief places of trust, a plain sign that he looked upon the possessors as his creatures. And indeed, since his return from Scotland, he had properly governed the Kingdom in his brother's name. This being known to all, might have shewn with what intention he promised to preserve the Protestant Religion, and the rights of the Subject, since no man could be ignorant, that he was the principal author of the plots in the late reign, against Religion, and the liberties of the nation. But the Tories, who were then highly exalted, were willing to shut their eyes, and not see the danger the Protestant Religion was in, under a King who was so zealous a Papist. The King's bare word was sufficient to calm all their uneasiness on that account. As for arbitrary power, which began to be introduced in the late reign, far from being frightened at it, they rather considered it as an effectual means to keep their adversaries, the Whigs, in subjection. Had they known or foreseen to what height James was resolved to carry his power, they would, doubtless, have had other thoughts. But they imagined, things would always remain as they were, that is, in a situation to them very advantageous.

Most of the Historians represent as surprizing, the King's going publickly to Mass two days after his accession to the Crown. But I cannot see any reason for this surprize. Since the year 1670, no man had been ignorant, that the Duke of York was a Catholic. On this account he had resigned the office of Lord High-Admiral, and in the following years, the Bill of Exclusion, which caused Pounds, and Forty Shilling Pieces, have the King's Head laureat, CAROLUS II. DEI GRATIA. Reverse, the Arms of the four Kingdoms, Eagle in four separate Shields crowned, a Scepter in each of the vacancies, with a Rose, Fleur-de-lis, Thistle, and Harp at the Points, and the Cross interlink'd in the center. MAG. BR. FRA. ET. HIB. REX. 1673. Upon the reverse, DECUS ET. TUTAMEN. ANNO. REGNI. VICENIMO. QUINTO. This King was the first that coined Crown and Half Guinea, when he was in his 23d year. The Guineas were ordered to go at Twenty Shillings, Money, the Shilling is very fair, and has a Crown for the Mint mark. Of these there are two sorts, one with XII. behind the Head, which the other wants; as also the inner Circle. (Fig. 1.) The Six pence are like the shillings, but have VI. instead of XII. The lesser Pieces from the Cross to the Penny, are marked with the initial Figures, H. H. H. I. behind the Head; except upon some of the Two pence, which want the Figure. This King's Head laureat, from thence called the Rose-Crown, CAROLUS II. DEI GRA. Reverse, MAG. BR. FRA. ET. HIB. REX. 1662. The Arms of the four Kingdoms in four Shields, France and England quartered together in the first and fourth; Each Shield is crown'd; between them are Crosses interlink'd, and St. George's Cross radiant in the center; upon the rim DECUS ET. TUTAMEN. (Fig. 2.) The Half-Crown are like the Crown; only one has the year in Figures upon the rim, ANNO. REGNI. XCVI. The middle of the obverse struck, having the Cross between the points of the crown, with the Arms of the four Kingdoms, and a shield in the center. Upon this is an Elephant; upon others the Prince's Features; and a third has the scepter. The Six-pence is like the Shilling. The Great has four Crosses interlink'd, with a Rose, Thistle, Fleur-de-lis, and Harp in the Vacancies. The very best, King's Head laureat, CAROLUS. A CAROLO. Reverse, BRITANNIA, and round her BUST ANNO. with the year in the exergue. There was another Farthing coin'd, of rare Copper, having on the Reverse, QVATVOR. MARIA. VINDICO. Exergue BRITANNIA. But these were called in to replace the French King.

1684-5. three Parliaments to be dissolved, had sufficiently taught the English this truth. Where then could the wonder be, to see him go to Mals, being King, since for the last fourteen years he had not concealed his Religion, though he had run the risque of forfeiting his right to the Crown?

James gave more just cause of surprize, was, his requiring by Proclamation the same week, that the customs, and other duties which had been granted to the King his brother, only for life, should be continued to be collected (1). This was a manifest invasion of the nation's right. He could not be ignorant, that an encroachment of the same nature had occasioned a great contest between the King his father and the Parliament, and that this contest produced the Petition of Right. And yet, he not only undertook the same thing, but used also the same reasons with Charles I., which were so little satisfactory to the Parliament. His proceedings were the more surprizing, as he affected to take by authority, what he knew would not be refused by the Parliament, considering the present disposition of the Kingdom. Though his friends endeavoured to excuse this conduct, it made impression upon many of both parties, who had no good opinion of a reign which began in this manner. This gave occasion to fear, that the new King's promises were not so firmly to be relied on, as was pretended.

Another step the King made at the same time, and as it seems, without any necessity, was to cause it to be published, and attested by Father Huddleston a Priest, that Charles II. died a Catholic, and that the same Priest gave him the Eucharist and Extreme Unction. Huddleston published with a little Treatise, called, a short and plain way to the Faith and Church; which treatise, the author affirms, made great impressions upon the mind of King Charles, in the year 1651, immediately after the battle of Worcester, so that he declared, he had not seen any thing more plain and clear upon the subject; and the arguments drawn from succession were so conclusive, he did not conceive how they could be denied. Moreover, at the same time, James ordered two papers to be published, found in the King his brother's strong box, written with his own hand, both tending to prove the necessity of a visible Church and guide, in matters of faith (2). To confirm that Charles II. was really a Catholic, Mr. William Chiffinch, Keeper of the King's closet, made no scruple to show a little chapel annexed to the closet, where the King went secretly to Mass. It is hard to conceive, what great advantage it could be to James, to divulge such a secret, considering the injury he did the late King's reputation, who had so frequently and solemnly affirmed in full Parliament, that he was a good Protestant, and had positively promised to maintain the Protestant Religion to the utmost of his power. As James thereby manifestly showed, the insincerity of his brother, he should, it seems, have feared, it would be inferred, there was no more reason to confide in his own promises.

The Funeral of Charles II. was solemnized on the 14th of February at night. It may easily be judged, it was not very expensive, since eight days were sufficient for the preparations. It is observable, that Charles II. had neglected after his restoration to solemnize his Father's Funeral, on pretence that his body could not be found in Wind-ford Chapel, the place where it was interred, as the Lord Clarendon says in his History. But as it would have been easy to search the whole Chapel, it is more likely, the reason of that neglect was the charges of a funeral, though Charles II. had received for that purpose from the Parliament the sum of seventy thousand pounds. For the same reason, probably, James caused his Brother to be buried with little pomp, though Charles left him ninety thousand guineas in a box.

Two days after, the King ordered the Privy-Counsellors and great officers of the Crown and Household to be sworn, and at the same time filled the vacant places. The office of Lord-Treasurer, vacant since the year 1679 by the resignation of the Earl of Danby, was conferred on Laurence Hyde Earl of Rochester the King's Brother-in-law; Henry Earl of Clarendon elder Brother to the Earl of Rochester, was made Lord-Privy-Seal; and George Savile Marquis of Halifax, President of the Council.

In the mean time, the Counties, Cities, Boroughs, and Universities were employed in preparing congratulatory addresses to the King, upon his accession to the Crown. These addresses, for the most part, took notice of the King's positive declaration to the Privy-Council, to maintain the Church of England and the liberties of the Nation. But there were two amongst others very remarkable. The first from the Barristers and Students of the Middle-Temple, wherein "with the deepest sense of gratitude they acknowledged his Majesty's great goodness, in extending his royal care of the Government to the preservation of the Customs, which had been continually received by his royal predecessors for some hundreds of years, and never questioned by any Parliament, unless in that wherein were sown the seeds of rebellion against the King his Father (3)." They concluded with saying, "May there never want millions as loyal as we are to sacrifice their lives and fortunes in defence of your sacred person and prerogative in its full extent." And promised that they would endeavour the choice of such representatives for the ensuing Parliament, as would not only concur in settling a revenue to support the Government as formerly, but also show an entire confidence in his Majesty. The address from the County of Suffolk had these words: "We are every day making steps towards your Majesty's grandeur, by our care for sending fit representatives to a Parliament, that we hope will no more endure Excluders than a late one did Abhorers." The Quakers also presented an address to the King, wherein they said: "Whereas it hath pleased Almighty God, (by whom Kings reign) to take hence the late King Charles the Second, and to preserve thee peaceably to succeed; we thy subjects heartily desire, that the giver of all good and perfect gifts, may please to endue thee with wisdom and mercy in the use of thy great power, to his glory, the King's honour, and the Kingdom's good. And it being our sincere resolution, according to our peaceable principles and conversation (by the assistance of Almighty God) to live peaceably and honestly, as becomes true and faithful subjects, under the King's government, and a conscientious people that truly fear and serve God: We do humbly hope, that the King's tenderness will appear and extend with his power to express the same" (6).

The King's and Queen's Coronation was celebrated the 23d of April, St. George's day, patron of the Order of the Garter. Though such a ceremony cannot be solemnized without pomp, it was observed, the King retrenched several things which caused a needless expence, as for instance the Cavalcade from the Tower to Westminster, which was wont to be performed the day before the Coronation, saving thereby a charge of sixty thousand pounds. But if some authors are to be credited, the most considerable retrenching was in the words of the Coronation oath, out of which, they pretend, several material things were struck without specifying the particulars. Others maintain, it is an aspersion on Archbishop Sancroft, who is supposed, without foundation, to have consented to the abridging of the oath. As I have seen no proof on either side, I forbear to decide. Thus much is certain, the Crown not being fit for the King's head, was often in a tottering condition and like to fall off. Mr. Henry Sidney supporting it once with his hand, pleasantly told the King, This hand is not the first time our Family hath supported the Crown (7). The people reckoned this an ill omen to the King, as another thing which happened the same day. In one of the Churches in London, the King's arms painted in a glass-window suddenly fell down and broke in pieces, while the rest of the window was standing, without a

(1) Another Proclamation was put out for levying the additional Excise, which had been given to the late King only for life. There was a Clause in this Act, that empowered the Treasury to make a farm of it for three years, without adding a limiting clause, in case it should be so long due. And it was thought a great breach of the clause, to make a fraudulent farm, by which it should continue to be levied three years or as it was determined, according to the Letter and intent of the Act. A farm was now brought out, as usual during the King's life, though it was well known, that no such farm had been made, for it was made after his death, but a false date put to it. Burton, p. 622.

(2) It was an open violation of our fundamental constitution, by which no money can be levied on the Subject, but by their consent in Parliament, as Dr. Wotton's Leighs observes, p. 128.

(3) The Duke of Ormond, besides the King's attestation, declared the papers to be King Charles's own hand.

(4) The Duke of Beaufort was made Lord President of Wales. The Lord Arlington Lord High Chamberlain. The Duke of Ormond Lord Steward of the Household. The Lord Grosvenor Lord Chamberlain to the Queen; the Lord Viscount Newport Treasurer of the Household; the Lord Maynard Comptroller; Henry Sturt Vice chamberlain; Henry Bullock Master of the Household; Sir Stephen Fox, Sir William Boreman, Sir William Geurvell, and Sir Richard Worsley, Clerks and Comptrollers of the Green-Cloth. Kennet p. 421.

The Reason of thanking the King for seizing the Customs, alleged by these Gentlemen, was, "That Thruwaits would be ruined that had paid Customs in the late King's Time, if the Customs were not levied, and by an excessive Exportation and Importation Custom-free, that Branch, of the Act for granting them should pass." Not considering that Estates might be made and Bonds taken, to be used when the Act for granting them should pass.

The true Address from Swell's History of the Quakers. Rapin has wrongly followed Echard, and given it as follows, "We are come to testify our sorrow for the death of our good friend Charles, and our joy for thy being made our Governor. We are told thou art not of the perfidious crew, who were there to see thee; we hope that thou wilt grant us the same liberty which thou allowest thyself."

Mr. St. John, who was afterwards Earl of Rumsey in King William's Reign, was one of the principal Instruments in the Downfall of King James, and one of the first that went and joined the Prince of Orange. Rapin.

5. possibility of discovering why that part should fall sooner than the rest (1).

The same day that the King was crowned at London, the Parliament of Scotland met at Edinburgh, William Douglas Duke of Queensbury being Lord High-Commissioner. This Lord was entirely in the King's party, but not in such a manner as to pretend to sacrifice to him the Protestant Religion and his Country's liberties. Before he left London in order for Scotland, he told the King plainly, he could not engage to serve him in any thing but what should be agreeable to the Laws; whereupon the King protested to him, he had no intention to make any breach either in the established Religion or the Laws.

The King's letter to the Scotch Parliament ran, "That the many experiences he had of the loyalty and exemplary forwardness of that ancient Kingdom, by their representatives assembled in Parliament in the reign of his Brother, made him desirous to call them together in the beginning of his reign, to give them an opportunity not only of shewing their duty, but also to be exemplary to others in their demonstrations of their affection to his person, and compliance with his desires. That which he had to propose to them at this time, was what was as necessary for their safety as his Service, and had a greater tendency to secure their own privileges and properties, than the aggrandizing his power, which however he was resolved to maintain in its greatest lustre, that he might be the more enabled to defend and protect their Religion as established by laws, and their rights and properties, against phanatical (2) contrivances, murderers, assassins (3), which had brought them into such difficulties, as only the steady resolutions of his Brother and those employed by him, could have saved them from the most horrid confusions and inevitable ruin. That nothing had been left unattempted by those inhuman Traitors, to overturn their peace; and therefore he hoped they would be wanting in nothing to secure themselves and him."—

The High-Commissioner seconded the King's letter with a speech, wherein he gave them assurance of his Majesty's resolutions to protect and maintain the Religion and Government of their Church as by Law established (4); and also the Subjects rights and properties, in such manner, that no person should be injured by any arbitrary oppressions of soldiers or others; and he would condescend as much in the business of the Excise and Militia as could be justly expected. And, on the other side, his Majesty expected from them, to assert the rigour and prerogatives of the Crown, and to establish the revenue as amply upon him and his Successors, as it was enjoyed by the King his Brother. In the last place, the Lord-Commissioner desired in very pathetic terms, that effectual means might be found to destroy the phanatical party, who were wretches of such monstrous principles and practices, as past ages never heard, nor those to come will hardly believe.

These phanatical murderers and assassins could be no other than the Presbyterians of Scotland, who were properly the Body of the nation, to whom was imputed the murder of the Archbishop of St. Andrews, as if it had been committed by the determination of the whole Presbyterian-Party.

James Drummond Earl of Perth, Lord Chancellor, made a Speech likewise, in which he enlarged on the King's great virtues. I do not know whether he was yet a Papist, but at least, presently after, he embraced the Catholic Religion, and by that infallible means supplanted the Duke of Queensbury.

The Parliament returned a very humble and submissive answer to the King, promising to do whatever he had desired. To perform which promise they forthwith passed the three following Acts.

By the first Act were ratified all Statutes passed in the late reign for the security of religion as at present professed within the Kingdom.

By the second, they annexed the Excise of foreign and inland commodities to the Crown of Scotland for ever.

By the third, they ordained, that all such persons, as being cited in case of High-Treason, Field or House Conventicles, or Church-irregularities, should refuse to give testimony, should be liable to be punished as guilty of those crimes respectively, in which they refused to be witnesses.

Before the meeting of the Parliament of England, which was called for the 19th of May, three persons, odious to the King, the Papists, and the prevailing party, were brought to their trials. The first was the famous Titus Oates, discoverer of the popish plot, and one of the witnesses against the condemned Jesuits. He was accused of perjury on two points of his evidence, namely, for affirming upon oath, that he was present at the grand Consult held at London the 24th of April 1678, where, as he pretended, the resolution of killing the King was taken. Secondly, for saying, that Father Ireland an executed Jesuit, was at London such a day. To convict him of these two real or pretended crimes, he was brought before Chief-Justice Jeffries at the King's Bench Bar, the 8th and 9th of May 1685. As I have amply spoken of this matter in the reign of Charles II, I shall not repeat here what has been already said, but confine my self to show the partiality wherewith Oates was tried and condemned.

In the first place, immediately after the indictment was read, and before any Witness was heard, the Attorney-General [Sir Robert Sawyer] made a Speech declaring, Oates was one of the greatest Impostors that ever did appear upon the stage, either in this kingdom, or any other nation. It must be observed, this Attorney-General had been one of the counsel for the King in 1678, to support and improve Oates's evidence.

2. Twenty Witnesses from St. Omer's were produced, who swore, that Oates was at that place the 24th of April 1678, at the very time that he said he was present at the grand consult. It is observable, that these very witnesses had deposed the same thing in 1678, and that the Jury had not regarded their evidence. But in 1685, there was not the least reason to reject their depositions.

3. Oates desired it might be observed, that the King's Counsel who were now against him, had been for him in the trials of the five Jesuits, and particularly the Attorney and Solicitor-General: That Lord Chief Justice Jeffries, before whom his cause was pleading, was among the King's Counsel in 1678, and did then expressly declare, That the Verdict against the five Jesuits was a just verdict. As he laid great stress upon the verdicts given upon his depositions, he was told, that these verdicts had been disbelieved several times, as well as believed. Moreover, the records of the trials of Sir George Wakeman and the Earl of Castlemain were produced, who being accused of the pretended plot, had been acquitted, and deposed upon oath, that Oates had not said one word of truth.

4. Oates demanded, whether a Papist in case of religion might be believed? It was replied, He might. And as if the question had been impertinent and foreign to the purpose, Justice Withens asked him, Whether he was come there to preach?

5. Oates urged the Lord Coke's practice, who would not allow of a Popish Recusant for a witness, even between party and party. To which it was answered in general, that this practice was contrary to law.

6. He said, that the Witnesses against him were brought up in a Seminary, against law. Jeffries replied, so was a Dissenter.

7. He insisted upon the Statute of the 27th year of Elizabeth against Seminary Priests and Jesuits. Whereupon Jeffries asked him, whether the witnesses owned themselves to be Priests and Jesuits?

8. He pleaded the Statute of the 3d of Charles I, to which Jeffries answered, It was nothing to the purpose.

9. Lastly, He represented, that the Lord Shaftsbury, upon his trial, moving that he might have liberty to bring an indictment of perjury against the witnesses that accused him, the Court over-ruled the motion, and would not suffer the King's evidence to be indicted of perjury, nor the Popish plot called in question. He inferred from thence, that having been himself evidence for the King, he could not for that reason be indicted of perjury. Jeffries told him, all this was nothing to the purpose. Then summing up the evidence, he concluded with these words: "There does not remain the least doubt, but that Oates is the blackest and most perjured villain that ever appeared upon the face of the earth."

The Jury withdrawing about a quarter of an hour, brought him in guilty of the perjury he was accused of.

The next day, he was tried upon the second indictment of perjury concerning Father Ireland. Above forty witnesses were produced against him, nine of whom were Protestants, who swore, that he was in Staffordshire 1685. when Oates said he was in London (1), and he was also found guilty of this indictment. What is most strange, some pretend, there is not the least appearance of injustice or partiality in the verdict against Oates, but on the contrary, the partiality is evident in the verdict against the five Jesuits. I leave it to the unbiassed reader to compare them and judge. But at least it cannot be denied, there was a great deal of puffin in the sentence against Oates, and much more in the execution of the same. The sentence was as follows:

p. 307.

1. That he should pay for a fine one thousand Marks upon each indictment.

2. That he should be stript of all his Canonical Habits.

3. That he should stand in the Pillory before Westminster-Hall upon Monday next, for an Hour's time, with a paper over his head (which he must first walk with round about to all the Courts in Westminster-Hall) declaring his crime; and that upon the first indictment.

4. That for the second indictment he should upon Tuesday stand in the Pillory at the Royal-Exchange in London, for an hour with the same inscription.

5. On Wednesday he should be whipt from Aldgate to Newgate.

6. On Friday he should be whipt from Newgate to Tyburn.

7. And for annual Commemorations, upon every 24th of April, as long as he should live, he was to stand in the Pillory at Tyburn, just opposite to the gallows, for an hour.

8. That, upon every 9th of August, he was to stand in the pillory at Westminster-Hall-Gate, because he had sworn that Ireland was in town between the 8th and 12th of August. The like on every 10th of August at Charing-Cross, and over-against the Temple-Gate every 11th of August. And upon every 2d of September he was to do the same at the Royal-Exchange. All this he was to do every year during his life: and be committed a close prisoner as long as he lived.

After pronouncing this sentence, Jeffries added, that if it had been in his power, Oates should have been condemned to die.

It must be observed, that standing in the Pillory, which in other countries only exposes to shame, is in England something more; for it is permitted to pelt those that stand there, with dirt, and all sorts of nastiness, and it often happens that the mob abuse this liberty, and throw rotten eggs and even stones at the prisoner.

But what was thought most barbarous in this sentence, was the ordering a man to be whipt twice in three days. Some charitable persons used their endeavours to beg off part of this wretched man's punishment, and made application to the Queen, intreating her to intercede for him, at least with regard to the second scourging. But all intercession was in vain. The sentence was executed with all imaginable rigor and barbarity. The first day he was tied to a cart, and as the hangman no doubt was commanded not to spare him, he executed the order with such cruelty, as was unknown to the English nation. Oates swooned away several times the first day with the extremity of the anguish. We may judge what he endured the second day, when his wounds were yet fresh. In a word, his sustaining such great torments, and escaping with life, was looked upon as something miraculous. Every one was sensible, that, both in the sentence and in the execution, revenge had a greater share than justice, and that he was made a sacrifice to the manes of the five Jesuits executed in the late reign.

The next victim to the Catholics, not long after Oates, was Thomas Dangerfield, who discovered the pretended Meal-Tub Plot, which he had laid to the charge of the Protestants. But afterwards, not being able to maintain before the Council what he had deplored, he confessed, he was perwaded to invent it by the Countess of Powis, and the popish Lords in the Tower. Moreover, he had published a Narrative of all the secret practices used as well to corrupt him, as to render the plot probable. As he owned, he had received money from the late King and the Duke of York, the last would never suffer such an offence to go unpunished, when he came to be King. Dangerfield therefore was committed to prison, and indicted for publishing a scandalous libel. He was tried and brought in guilty by the Jury, after which he received judgment at the King's-Bench bar, "That he should stand twice in the pillory; that he should be whipt from Aldgate to Newgate 1685. "on one day, and from Newgate to Tyburn on another, "and should pay a fine of five hundred pounds." The scourging was executed with rigor, though with less cruelty than on Oates. The second day, Dangerfield, after the he is killed, whipping was over, being in a coach against Hatten-Garden, Robert Francis, a Barrister of Grey's-Inn, came to the coach side, and using some insulting expressions, Dangerfield returned a reproachful answer (2). Francis having a small cane in his hand, thrust it into his eye with his force, which in two hours put an end to his life. Francis was condemned to be hanged, and was executed accordingly, the King, though strongly solicited for a pardon, not thinking proper to leave such a crime unpunished (3).

Richard Baxter, a Presbyterian Minister, famous for his voluminous writings during the troubles, in favour of the Religion against the Church of England, was the third in the flame of the mildness of the new Government. As he could not be proceeded against for his books published during the troubles, by reason of the Act of Indemnity, a Paraphrase on the New Testament, wherein it was pretended, there were several seditious passages, and by reflecting on the Bishops. Baxter being brought Jeffries at the King's-Bench bar, and moving, that farther time might be allowed him for his trials, Jeffries, with his usual moderation, cried out, I will not give him a minute's time more to save his life: We have had to do with other sort of persons, but now we have a Saint to deal with; and I know how to deal with Saints as well as Sinners. Tender, says he, stands Oates in the pillory, and says, he suffers for the Truth, and so says Baxter; but if Baxter did but stand on the other side of the pillory with him, I would say, there stood two of the greatest rogues and rascals in the Kingdom. In this manner did the Judge prepare the Jury, before any evidence was heard. It would be needless to insert the particulars of the charge and Baxter's defence. The point was only to know, whether certain passages of his book could be applied to the Prelates of the Church of England, or solely to those of the Church of Rome. Baxter's Counsel (4) urged, that without a forced construction, none of the passages could be applied to the Bishops of the Church of England. The whole process turned on this point. But it will not be improper to show the partiality of Jeffries in this, as in all other cases. Baxter alleged in his defence, "That he had been severely treated with respect to the Church of England, and had spoken so honourably of the Bishops, that he had incurred the censure of many of the Dissenters upon that account." Jeffries, laying aside on this occasion the office of a Judge to turn evidence, affirmed, "That Baxter was an enemy to the name and thing, the office of and persons of Bishops; and severely reprimanded the Council, probably for defending their cause too well. Then, speaking to Baxter, he said, Richard, thou art an old fellow, an old knave, thou hast written books enough to load a cart, every one as full of sedition, I might say treason, as an egg is full of meat. Hadst thou been whipped out of thy writing trade forty years ago, it had been happy. Thou pretendest to be a preacher of the Gospel of Peace, and thou hast one foot in the grave; it is time for thee to begin to think what account thou intendest to give. But leave thee to thyself, and I see thou'lt go on as thou hast begun; but by the grace of God I will look after thee. I know thou hast a mighty party, and I see a great many of the brotherhood in corners, waiting to see what will become of their mighty Don; and a Doctor of the party [Dr. Bates] at your elbow; but by the grace of Almighty God I will crush you all.

The Chief Justice in summing up the evidence said; It is notoriously known, that there has been a design to ruin the King and the Nation; and this has been the main incendiary: He is as much now as can be; but time was, when no man was so ready to bind your Kings in chains, and your Nobles in fetters of iron; and to your Tents, O Israel! Gentlemen, for God's sake do not let us be galled twice in an age.

It manifestly appears from these last words of Jeffries, that Baxter's book was only a pretence to punish him for what he had done during the troubles. However this be, such was the impartial manner in which this Judge directed the Jury. There is scarce a man who will deny, that, as well during this reign, as in the latter part of the former, all the Juries were packed, and had engaged beforehand to be guided by the Court. In conclusion, Baxter being found

(1) It undeniably appeared from the Books of one Hinton, a Cadsmith in Lombard Street, that Ireland was in London in that time. See R. C. B. p. 330.

(2) Francis said to him, "Now, friend, have you had your heat this morning?" Upon which the other, with two or three curses called him, Son of a Whore. Richard Tem. III. p. 742.

(4) Baxter's Counsel were Wallis, Williams, Rotherham, Arwood, and Phipp, all retained by Mr. Henry Ashwell, who had a quarrel with Jeffries. Baxter It may be noted of Baxter, that soon after the Reformation he visited the Bishops, and was turned out of his living with the rest, for back a Pension of a Hundred Pounds a Year offered him by the King. He frequented the Church of England, went to the Sacrament, and persuaded others to do the same. Richard, Tem. III. p. 743.

1685. guilty, judgment was given against him, to be fined five hundred marks; to lie in prison till he paid it; and to be bound to his good behaviour for seven years.

The Parliament met the 19th of May. But the King was pleased that the Commons should first chafe their Speaker, before he made his Speech to both Houses. The choice fell upon Sir John Trevor, who was recommended by [the Lord Middleton] one of the Secretaries of State; after which, the King came to the Parliament the 22d of May, and made the following Speech to both Houses. As he had that morning received advice of the Earl of Argyle's arrival in Scotland, it gave him occasion to add something to his Speech.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

After it pleased Almighty God, to take to his mercy the late King my dearest Brother, and to bring me to the peaceable possession of the Throne of my Ancestors, I immediately resolved to call a Parliament, as the best means to settle every thing upon those foundations, as may make my reign both easy and happy to you: Towards which, I am disposed to contribute all that is fit for me to do. What I said to my Privy-Council, at my first coming there, I am desirous to renew to you; wherein I fully declared my opinion concerning the principles of the Church of England, whose members have shewed themselves so eminently loyal in the worst of times, in defence of my father, and support of my brother, of blessed memory, that I will always take care to defend and support it: I will make it my endeavour to preserve this Government both in Church and State, as it is now by Law established; and as I will never depart from the just rights and Prerogative of the Crown, so I will never invade any man's property: And you may be sure, that having heretofore ventured my life in the defence of this Nation, I will still go as far as any man in preserving it in all its just rights and liberties.

And having given you this assurance concerning the care I will have of your Religion and Property, which I have chosen to do in the same words, I used at my first coming to the Crown, the better to evidence to you, that I spoke them not by chance, and, consequently, that you may the more firmly rely upon a Promise so solemnly made; I cannot doubt, that I shall fail of suitable returns from you, with all imaginable duty and kindness on your part; and particularly, in what relates to the settling of my revenue, and continuing it during my life, as it was in the time of the King my Brother. I might use many arguments to enforce this demand, from the benefit of trade, the support of the Navy, the necessity of the Crown, and the well-being of the Government itself; which I must not suffer to be precarious: But I am confident, your own consideration of what is just and reasonable, will suggest to you whatsoever might be enlarged upon this occasion. There is one popular argument, which I foresee may be used against what I ask of you, from the inclination men may have for frequent Parliaments, which some may think will be the best secured, by feeding me from time to time, by such proportions as they shall think convenient: And this argument, it being the first time I speak to you from the Throne, I will answer once for all, that this would be a very improper method to take with me, and that the best way to engage me to meet you often, is always to use me well (1). I expect therefore that you will comply with me in what I have desired, and that you will do it speedily; that this may be a short session, and that we may meet again to all our satisfactions.

My Lords and Gentlemen, "I must acquaint you, that I have had news this morning from Scotland, that Argyle is landed in the West-High-lands, with the men he brought with him from Holland; and that there are two Declarations published, one in the name of all those in arms there, the other in his own; it would be too long for me to repeat the substance of them it is sufficient to tell you, I am charged with usurpation and tyranny: The shorter of them I have directed to be forthwith communicated to you. I will take the best care I can, that this Declaration of their own treason and rebellion may meet with the reward it deserves: And I will not doubt, but that you will be the more zealous to "support the Government and give me my revenue as I have desired it, without delay."

I shall make upon this speech, three remarks the importance whereof will hereafter appear. The first is, that when the King renewed to his Parliament the promise he had made to the Council, to preserve the Government both in Church and State, as it is by law established, nothing was farther from his thoughts than the performance of it. This will very clearly appear in the sequel. Wherefore this promise was only a lure used by the King to engage the Parliament to enable him to proceed without them. This happened accordingly, for this Parliament, which had but two short sessions, was the only one the King called in his Reign.

The second remark is, that when the King said, he would not suffer the Government to be precarious, (that is to depend upon the supplies the Parliament should grant him from time to time) he plainly intimated, he meant to govern in a different manner from his predecessors, since among all the Kings of England, there was never any whose Government was not supported by the aids of the Parliaments.

The third is, that the objection which he foresaw would be made to his desire concerning his revenue, was so strong, that he could find no other reason to answer it than a menace, which ought rather to induce the Parliament to guard against it. For if the King, in case of refusal, thought himself powerful enough to make the Parliament repent, how much greater reason was there to fear, if he should be enabled to proceed without the Parliament, and to execute his threat.

This Parliament, according to some Historians, was better composed than any for many years past. All the members were rich, zealous for their Country, good Churchmen, averse to all republican or anti-monarchical principles, faithful to the King, and of so wonderful harmony among themselves, that the like had never been seen. The meaning of all which in short is, that they were Tories without any mixture of Republicans, Presbyterians, or Whigs. This Parliament consisted indeed of persons prepossessed in favour of the King, who imagining that, according to his promises, he would never meddle with the Laws or Religion, believed it a signal service to the Kingdom, to enable the King to oppose effectually the attempts of the Whigs. They were mistaken in their supposition: But it cannot be inferred from their conduct, that they intended to betray the Nation's interests, as they plainly showed afterwards.

Other Historians do not give the same idea of this Parliament. They pretend, the members for the most part, being elected by the intrigues of the Court, were Tories, and most violent for the doctrine of Passive-Obedience, and for that reason surrendered the liberties of the people, and paved the way for the King to become absolute, by granting him such a revenue as enabled him to govern without a Parliament (2).

Though these two assertions with respect to this Parliament, seem to be opposite, it is however easy to reconcile them, on supposition of a thing which is very true, namely, the Parliament was deceived by the King's promises. So, the only difference between these two opinions, is, that the Whigs accuse the Tories of betraying the interest of their Country, with premeditated design, and the Tories, without denying that they acted indeed against the interests of the Kingdom, maintain that they did so, through a too great confidence in the King's word, given from the Throne in the most solemn manner. It will hereafter be seen, that the Parliament had no such intention, as is imputed to them: But I cannot say their inprudence may be so easily vindicated.

However this be, both Houses pleased with the King's speech, waited on him the same day with an address of thanks; to which the King answered, "That he was very well pleased with their thanks, and could repeat no more than what he had said in the morning, and they should find that he would be as good as his word."

This confirmation was so agreeable to the Commons, that when they returned to their House, they voted immediately, nemine contradicente, "That all the revenue enjoyed by the late King at his death, should be granted to his present Majesty, and settled upon him during his life." Thus the constant and ordinary revenue of the late King, which, according to the intent of the first Parliament, held in his Reign, was to be twelve hundred

(1) The King's aim, in this latter part of his Speech, was to prevent a Motion, which was talked of abroad, though none ventured to make it in the House, "That it was safest to grant the Revenue only for a Term of years." Burnet, p. 638.

(2) Burnet says of this Parliament, that all Arts were used to manage Elections, so that the King should have a Parliament to his Mind. Complaints came up from all Parts of England of the Injustice and Violence used in Elections beyond what had ever been practised in former Times. In the new Charters that had been granted, the Election of the Members was taken out of the Hands of the Inhabitants, and restored to the Corporation-Men, all those being left out, who were not acceptable as Court. In some Boroughs they could not find a Number of Men to be depended upon; So the neighbouring Gentlemen were obliged to corrupt them. And in some Places, Persons of other Counties, not so much as known in the Borough, were named. This was practised in the year 1685. Minister in Council by the Earl of Bath, who put the Officers of the Guards Name in almost all the Charters of that County, so that the King was sure of Forty four Votes on all Occasions. There were not above Forty but what were thus chosen. Burnet, p. 625.

thousand pounds Sterling, but which amounted to above double that sum; this revenue I say, which two Parliaments had spent about two years in settling, was granted to Charles II. in the space of two hours. They who speak most moderately of this revenue, compute it at more than two millions. But a Historian (1) pretends, that including the hundred and fifty thousand pounds, enjoyed by the King while Duke of York, and annexed to the crown, the whole amounted to above two millions five hundred and fifty thousand pounds. This liberality was not founded upon the services the King when Duke of York had done the nation, but solely upon his promises to support the Government of the Church and State. But, through extreme prejudice, the Parliament was not aware, that by granting the King for life such an immense revenue, they enabled him to maintain an army and fleet without the assistance of Parliament, and consequently to subdue those that should dare to oppose his will, as he did afterwards.

The Commons having given the King for real a demonstration of their zeal and affection, the Lords were willing likewise to show him how much they were devoted to him in whatever lay in their power. To that end, the King having sent a warrant to the Attorney-General to enter a Noli Prosequi upon the indictments against the popish Lords, who had been prisoners in the Tower for the plot, and against the Earl of Danby, the House of Peers annulled their order of the 19th of March 1678-9, and entirely discharged those Lords who had been released only upon bail.

These proceedings in favour of the Popish Lords, made way for a Bill to reverse the Attainder of the Lord Viscount Stafford in 1680. The sole reason alledged in the Bill for this reversal was in these words: Whereas it is now manifest, that the said William late Viscount Stafford was innocent of the treason laid to his charge, and the testimony whereupon he was found guilty was false. Be it enacted, &c. Thus, the preparers of the Bill founded the Lord Stafford's innocence upon Oates's being condemned for perjury, though in Oates's trial there was not a word of his testimony against Stafford. Nevertheless, the Bill was passed by a majority of voices. But such of the Lords (2) as opposed it, entered their dissents for the following reasons:

1. Because the assertion in the Bill of its being now manifest, that the late Viscount Stafford died innocent, and that the testimony by which he was convicted was false, which are the sole grounds and reasons given to support the Bill, are destitute of all proof, warrant, or testimony, or matter of record before us.

2. That the record of the King's Bench read at the Committee, concerning the conviction, last term, of one of the witnesses for perjury, in collateral points of proofs, of no affinity to the Lord Stafford's trial, and given several years before, it is conceived, can be no ground to invalidate the testimony upon which the said Viscount was convicted, which could never legally be by one witness, and was in fact by the judgement of his Peers, on the evidence of at least three.

3. It is conceived, the said judgement in the King's Bench was unprecedented, illegal, and highly derogatory to the honour, judicature, and authority of this Court, who have power to question and punish perjuries of witnesses before them, and ought not to be imposed upon by the judgements of inferior Courts, or their attainer of a Peer invalidated by implication; and the Popish Plot, so condemned, pursued, and punished by his late Majesty and four Parliaments, after public solemn devotion through the whole Kingdom, by authority of Church and State, to be eluded to the arraignment and scandal of the Government; and only for restoring the family of one Popish Lord. And all this being without any matter judicially appearing before us to introduce the same; and the records of the trial not suffered to be read, for the information of the truth, before the passing of the Bill.

4. For many other weighty reasons, offered and given by divers Peers in the two days debate of this Bill, both at the committee, and in the House.

These reasons plainly show, in my opinion, that the Lords, in passing this Bill, designed rather to oblige the King than do justice to the memory of the Lord Stafford. But the Commons had not the same complaisance, since it was dropped after the second reading, and never heard of more, they having no intention to strengthen or encourage the Popish party (3).

The Parliament of Scotland was still extremely zealous for the King's interest. Besides the Acts before-mentioned, they passed one for granting the King during life the yearly sum of two hundred and sixty thousand pounds; and another declaring, That the giving or taking the national Covenant, or the solemn League and Covenant, or owning them as lawful or obligatory, should incur the crime of high-treason.

Since the Earl of Argyle's escape after his condemnation in 1681, he had kept himself concealed at Amsterdam, and very few persons in Scotland knowing where he was. He waited there for a favorable opportunity either to make his escape with the King, or to raise in Scotland, where he had many friends, an insurrection, which should put him again in possession of his estate. He believed a fair occasion offered for an insurrection after the death of Charles II, knowing that the Duke of York, who was to succeed, was beloved neither in Scotland nor England. For though, in both Kingdoms, the Government, and all the public offices were in the hands of the Tories, the Earl of Argyle imagined, that if by his credit he could raise an army in Scotland, all the Presbyterians would lift under his banner, and then his party would be much superior to the King's.

Whilst he was full of these thoughts, the Prince of Orange, foreseeing, the King his Father-in-law would soon desire the States to deliver up the Duke of Monmouth, advised him to retire elsewhere. The Duke followed his advice, and withdrew to Brussels. But fearing he was not safe there, and that the Court of Spain would think proper to sacrifice him to King James, he repaired privately to Amsterdam, where he had frequent conferences with Argyle. They had nothing ready to make an attempt, which might have the least appearance of success. They were both without money, and not sure of friends in England or Scotland to second their projects. Mean while, the Earl of Argyle meeting at Amsterdam with a rich Widow, who lent him ten thousand pounds, this unexpected supply so encouraged him, that he resolved to make a descent in Scotland, where he hoped, that his name, his credit, and the cause he intended to support, would procure him friends enough. But the Duke of Monmouth was not in so favorable a situation. He flattered himself, that the enmity of the Whigs against the Duke of York would revive, when they should see one at the head of their party: but he had yet no private correspondence with such of the nobility and gentry, whose credit would be able to support him, and moreover he wanted money. However, the Earl of Argyle perceiving how advantageous it would be to him, that the Duke of Monmouth should make an invasion in England, whilst he should himself do the like in Scotland, he managed that he length he persuaded him to try the same fortune, though not till after the Duke had long resisted his solicitations. Indeed, as the Duke's affairs then stood, it was a rash undertaking, especially as it was to be executed when the Parliament was sitting. But some of his friends, very unfit to manage such a design, and who were tired with living in exile, did all they could to encourage him (4). He therefore promised Argyle, that as soon as he should hear of his landing in Scotland, he would not fail to make a descent in England.

Upon this positive promise, the Earl of Argyle sail'd with three small ships laden with arms for five thousand men, having with him some German officers and some soldiers lifted in Holland. He arrived the 5th of May before Orkney in the north of Scotland, and sent his Secretary on shore for intelligence how the Country stood affected. But the Secretary being seized and brought to Edinburgh, the Earl found nothing was to be done in those parts. Wherefore he put to Sea again, and landed in the West-
Highlands, at a place called Dunstaffnage, a ruinous castle formerly his own. Here he left his arms and ammunition, and then published two declarations mentioned by the King in his Speech to both Houses. Whereupon the Parliament of Scotland now sitting, passed an Act, That all the Subjects of Scotland should take the oath of allegiance anew, and assert the royal prerogatives whenever they should be required, upon pain of banishment or imprisonment.

The King, as we have seen, communicated to the Parliament of England but one of Argyle's declarations: however presently after he imparted also the other. Whereupon both Houses came to this resolution, That they would assist his Majesty with their lives and fortunes, against the Earl of Argyle and his adherents, and all other traitors whatsoever. The King very graciously thanked Pris. 9 of the Committee of Religion against the Presbyterians, 11 Feb. 1704. Richard. III. p. 752.

May 27. Kennet. p. 441.

The committee appointed by the House of Commons for the affairs of religion, and which, no doubt, consisted of the most zealous Churchmen, considered the Earl of Argyle's invasion in Scotland, as an outrage committed by all the Presbyterians of both Kingdoms. Though the particulars of this invasion could not yet be known, except only that the Earl of Argyle was landed in Scotland, and had published two declarations, the Committee took occasion to draw up two votes, namely, 1st, That it is the opinion of the Committee, that this House will stand by his Majesty with their lives and fortunes, in defence of the Reformed Religion of the Church of England, as it is by law established. 2^{dly}, That an humble address be presented to his Majesty, to desire him to issue out a proclamation, to cause the penal Laws to be put in execution against all Dissenters whatsoever. This last vote was the pure effect of the Committee's prejudice, founded on the King's promise, that he would support and preserve the Church of England to the utmost of his power. Probably, they imagined, the King, though a Papist, was ready to proceed with vigour against all the enemies of that Church. But the previous question being, Whether the question should then be put for the House to agree with the Committee? it was carried in the negative. It was considered, 'twould not be agreeable to the King to cause the penal Laws to be executed against all Dissenters, and consequently against those of his own Religion. On the other hand, it was not proper to confine the order to the Presbyterians in particular, without mention of the Papists. For these reasons, the House, after mature deliberation, came to the following resolution, Nemine Contradicente, "That this House doth acquiesce, and entirely rely, and rest wholly satisfied on his Majesty's gracious word, and repeated declaration, to support and defend the Religion of the Church of England, as it is now by Law established, which is dearer to us than our Lives." This vote clearly shows, that though the Commons and Tories in general expressed a very great zeal for the King's interest, they had no intention to countenance the Romish Religion, tho' some of their enemies have been pleased to draw such an inference.

Pursuant to this resolution, when the Revenue-bill was ready, and the King came to the House of Peers to give the royal assent, the Speaker of the Commons made the following Speech:

Most gracious Sovereign,

The Speaker's Speech to the King. May 30. Kennet. p. 437. Richard. III. p. 752.

"WE the Knights, Citizens, and Burgeffes of the House of Commons assembled in Parliament, do present to your Majesty the revenue you was pleased to demand at the opening of this Parliament, wherein we proceeded with as much speed, as the forms of passing bills of that nature would admit. We bring not with it any bill for the preservation or security of our Religion, which is dearer to us than our lives. In that we acquiesce entirely, and rest wholly satisfied in your Majesty's gracious and sacred word, repeated declarations, and assurance to support and defend the Religion of the Church of England, as it is now by law established. We present this revenue to your Majesty, without the condition of any additional, appropriating, or tacking clauses whatsoever. And we humbly beseech your Majesty to accept of it, and along with it our hearty prayers, That God Almighty would bless you with a long life, and happy reign to enjoy it."

Gazettes. N^o. 2039.

Upon the passing this bill, his Majesty was pleased to make this Speech to both Houses.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"I Thank you very heartily for the Bill you have presented me this day; and I assure you, the readiness and cheerfulness that hath attended the dispatch of it, is as acceptable to me as the Bill itself. After so happy a beginning, you may believe I would not call upon you unnecessarily for an extraordinary supply: But when I tell you, that the stores of the navy and ordnance are extremely exhausted; that the anticipations upon several branches of the revenue are great and burthensome; that the debts of the King my brother, to his servants and family, are such as deserve compassion; that the Rebellion in Scotland, without putting more weight upon it than it really deserves, must oblige me to considerable expence extraordinary: I am full such considerations will move you to give me an aid to provide for those things, wherein the security, the ease and the happiness of my Government are so much concerned. But above

"all, I must recommend to you the care of the navy, the strength and glory of this Nation, that you would put it into such a condition, as may make us considered and respected abroad. I cannot express my concern upon this occasion more suitable to my own thoughts of it, than by assuring you, I have a true English heart, as jealous of the honour of the nation as you can be; and I please my self with the hopes, that by God's blessing, and your assistance, I may carry the reputation of it yet higher in the world than ever it has been in the time of any of my ancestors. And as I will not call upon you for supplies, but when they are of publick use and advantage, so I promise you, that what you give me upon such occasions, shall be managed with good husbandry; and I will take care it shall be employed to the uses for which I ask them."

If ever there was occasion to repeat his promises concerning Religion, and the nation's Liberties, it was doubtless immediately after receiving from the House of Commons so real a proof of their zeal, founded, as the Speaker said, upon their confidence in the King's word. But it was by no means proper for the King to renew a promise he did not intend to perform. When this promise had procured him what he desired, it was entirely forgot; and if it was sometimes mentioned among the King's adherents, it was only to palliate the violation of it, as will hereafter appear.

Remark on this Speech.

The very moment the King thanked the Commons for their noble present, they had occasion to perceive their error, in not appointing the uses to which such an immense revenue should be applied. It manifestly appeared by the King's Speech, that he did not pretend to employ this revenue solely in the usual expences of the Government, since at that very time, he demanded a great and extraordinary aid, for all the other things enumerated by him, and even for the maintenance of the navy, as if his revenue had been too inconsiderable to supply his occasions.

In short, it must appear strange, that James, for having gained one naval victory, should affect to exalt himself above all his predecessors. This was a vanity which did not seem to become him. Besides, it will hereafter be seen, that nothing was farther from his thoughts than the design of promoting the honour and reputation of the English nation. Nevertheless, the Commons highly pleased with the King's Speech, granted him an additional duty of excise upon Wines and Vinegar, with a further imposition upon Sugar and Tobacco.

Whilst these things passed in England, the Earl of Argyle was endeavouring to strengthen himself in Scotland, dispersing declarations, and sending letters upon letters to his relations and friends. But though he was in his own county of Argyle, and the inhabitants had been formerly his vassals, all he could do was to assemble two or three thousand men. With this little army he crossed over, and landed in the Isle of Bute. But within few days, having notice that a great number of forces, under the command of [the Earl of Dumbarton,] the Duke of Gordon, the Marquis of Athol, the Earl of Arran, and others, were advancing towards him from several parts, in order to surround him, he was forced to shift from Island to Island, to avoid them. This he could easily do, by means of his three ships, and several small boats, till he heard that three men of war, and some frigates, would soon come and attack him. Then, he marched into Argyleshire towards Inverary, ordering his vessels and boats to come and join him. But they were hindered by contrary winds from doing it soon enough. So, finding himself surrounded on all sides, and considering that few came to join him, and that his troops began to desert, he gave out, that he intended to attack the Marquis of Athol, who was at Inverary. But at the same time, he ordered the old castle of Ellengreg to be fortified in the best manner possible, and leaving his cannon there, with a garrison of one hundred and eighty men, marched into Dumbartonshire. The same day, the King's ships came up to the castle, with intent to batter it, but the castle surrendered upon the firing of the first gun. By which the Earl lost five thousand arms, five hundred barrels of powder, and all his cannon, besides his three ships which were also taken at the same time. This loss so discouraged Argyle, as well as his officers, that from that moment they thought only of means to escape. But as, after the loss of their ships, there was no way to fly out of Scotland, they retired from place to place with all possible speed, even to the swimming of rivers. But they were so hotly pursued, that they were forced at length to disperse into small parties (1), in order to save some, in case the rest should have the misfortune to be overtaken. At last, not to be tedious, I shall say in two words, the Earl of Argyle

(1) It was then generally believed, that they were betrayed by Sir John Cockram, one of those that came over with Argyle. For the undertaking to provide Guides to conduct them safely into Gallswater, and either mistaking the way, or designedly misleading them, he carried them into a bog, where they lost their Effects and Baggage. Kennet, p. 436.

1685. having received a wound in his head, was obliged to quit his horse, and run into the water up to his neck to save himself. In this posture he was taken by a countryman, who threatened to knock him down if he would not yield (1). This happened on the 17th of June, twenty-eight days after his first landing in Scotland. He was not suffered to languish long. For, being brought to Edinburgh with great ignominy, his head was cut off in a few days, and placed on the Toll-Booth of the City (2). Rumbold, one of his friends and confidants, was likewise taken and executed with several others (3). Thus the King, without having contributed scarce any thing to it, saw himself delivered from the danger which threatened him from Scotland.

The Duke of Monmouth, pursuant to his promise to Argyle, sailed out of the Texel the 24th of May, with a small man of war of thirty two guns, and two other vessels. He met with such contrary winds, that he was nineteen days at sea, though without being discovered by the King's ships which waited in the Channel to intercept him, the King having had so early notice of his design, that Stelton, his Majesty's Envoy at the Hague, had obtained an order from the States to arrest him. For which reason, the Duke departed sooner than he intended. At last, he landed the 11th of June, with about eighty followers, in the West of England, near Lyme, and the same day repaired to the town, where he was received without opposition. Here he published a declaration against the King. As this declaration is well known, I shall only mention the most material things in it (4).

In the preface he said, "That Government was originally instituted by God, and this or that form of it chosen and submitted to by men, for the happiness and security of the governed, and not for the private interest, and personal greatness of those that rule. That the government of England was, above all others, happy in its primitive form, whereby the prerogatives of the Crown, and the privileges of the Subjects were so far from justling one another, that the People's rights tended to render the King great, and the Prince's prerogatives were in order to the subjects protection and safety. But that all the boundaries of the Government had of late been broken, and nothing left unattempted, for turning the limited Monarchy into an absolute tyranny."

Then the Duke proceeded to impute to the King all the mischiefs in the reign of Charles II, as, "the burning of London, the alliance with France, the two wars with Holland, the popish Plot, Godfrey's murder, the Protestant-plot, the seditious witnesses to swear the most zealous patriots out of their lives, the hiring of villains to assassinate the Earl of Essex, and causing others to be clandestinely cut off, the frequent prorogations and dissolutions of the Parliaments."

He next proceeded to what the Duke of York had done since he assumed the title of King, as "the avowing himself of the Romish Religion; his publishing two Proclamations, one whereof required the collecting of the Customs, and the other continued that part of the Excise which was to expire at the King's death; his advancing those to the Bench that were the scandal of the Bar, and constituting those very men to declare the laws who were branded in Parliament for perverting them; his causing Juries to be packed, false returns to be made, and new illegal Charters to be granted, in order to have a Parliament that should, instead of preserving the People's liberties, establish his arbitrariness, and confirm the Subjects thralldom." He declared moreover, "That he did not take up arms to revenge any personal injuries, but solely for vindicating his Country's Religion and Laws." He did not fail however to affirm, "That his mother was lawful wife of Charles II." In conclusion, he accused the King of poisoning the late King his Brother. The rest of the declaration contained the usual protestations and invitations in papers of this nature.

Though the facts contained in this declaration cannot be looked upon as proofs that the King was guilty of what the Duke of Monmouth laid to his charge, they may serve however for proof, that the King from that time was accused of them, at least by some men, and that these accusations were not invented after his fall.

The King having communicated to both Houses the Duke of Monmouth's landing at Lyme, they presented an address to him, assuring him of their zeal and affiance, and immediately after the Commons proceeded to a Bill of Attainder against the Duke of Monmouth (5). At the same time they desired his Majesty to issue a Proclamation, promising a reward of five thousand pounds to any that should bring in the Duke dead or alive. The Bill of Attainder was dispatched by the Commons in two days, and in one by the Lords.

The 16th of June the King came to the House of Peers, and gave the royal assent both to this Bill and the money-bills before-mentioned. Two days after he sent a message to the Commons, to acquaint them, that he judged it necessary for the members to be present in their respective Counties, and therefore desired there should be an adjournment in a few days; desiring there might be a good fund for a present sum of money, to answer the immediate charge his Majesty must be at, on account of the Duke of Monmouth's rebellion in the West. Upon this message the Commons voted a supply of four hundred thousand pounds for the King's present extraordinary occasions.

The two Houses were so expeditious to answer the King's desires, that on the 27th of June there were twelve Bills ready, most of them for the King's benefit; and on the 2d of July, four more (6), besides private Bills. That day, the Parliament was adjourned to the 4th of August. But the Lord Keeper gave notice, that the King did not intend there should be a session, but that the members about London should meet and adjourn themselves as there should be occasion, till winter, or till the King should appoint the time by Proclamation. Thus ended the first session of this Parliament, having done in six weeks what no other ever did in many months (7).

The Duke of Monmouth's followers, who were not above eighty two when he landed at Lyme, increased to two thousand in three or four days. This made him hope they would continually increase as he advanced into the country. Wherefore, he departed from Lyme the 15th of June, and came the same day to Axminster. He thereby prevented Christopher Monk Duke of Albemarle, who with four thousand of the Militia intended to go thither in order to besiege him in Lyme. The Duke of Monmouth being come to Axminster, disposed his troops in such manner, that Albemarle, instead of attacking him, thought proper to retreat, perceiving his Militia-men had no inclination to do their duty. Albemarle's retreat enabled the Duke of Monmouth to march to Taunton, where he arrived the 18th, and was received with loud acclamations. His army being considerably increased during a five or six days stay at Taunton, he imagined his affairs were in a prosperous way, and that all the Country would join him. In this expectation he called a Council, where it was resolved he should assume the title of King. He had already insinuated in his Declaration, that he was lawful son of Charles II, and thereby shewn, that he pretended to the Crown. But, in all likelihood, he would not have taken the title so soon, had not those about him (8), represented to him, that appearing in arms against a King actually on the throne, he must be accounted a rebel as long as that King's right was acknowledged: That therefore, neither the Nobility nor People could have any pretence to join him; whereas by taking upon him the royal style, he would have the same advantage as James with regard to right. Probably, there was no occasion to use many other arguments to prevail with him. What he had intimated in his Declaration, plainly shews, that this was the end he proposed to himself. The only thing therefore was to consult about the most proper

He justified all he had done; for he said, he was unjustly attainted; and that had dissolved his Allegiance. He denied the Truth of that Conspiracy. He owned that he had heard many Propositions at Woff's Chambers about killing the two Brothers, and upon that he had said, it could have been easily executed near his House; upon which some Discourse had followed how it might have been managed. But he said, it was only Talk, and that nothing was laid or so much as resolved on. He said he was for kingly Government, but did not believe that God had made the greater part of Man kind with saddles on their backs, and bridles in their mouths, and some few booted and spurred to ride the rest. When Ailiffe was brought to London and examined by the King, he refused to discover any thing. Whereupon the King said, Mr. Ailiffe, you know it is in my Power to pardon you, therefore say that which most pleases you. 1685. time for it. In short, pursuant to the advice of those he consulted, he was proclaimed King at Taunton the 20th of June by the name of James II.

He began his pretended Reign with three Proclamations. By the first, he promised the sum of five thousand pounds to any that should bring the Duke of York dead or alive. By the second, he declared the Parliament now sitting a seditious assembly, and gave power to any that would lay hold of the members as rebels and traitors, if they did not separate before the end of June. The third was to declare the Duke of Albemarle a traitor, who lay within six miles of Taunton with his Militia-men to attack him, if he found opportunity.

The 21st of June the Duke marched for Bridgewater. He was received there as at Taunton, especially as his army was increased to five thousand men, and might have been more numerous, had he been able to arm those that offered to serve him. Besides arms he wanted also good Officers, scarce any but the meanest of the people having joined him. After causing himself to be proclaimed in Bridgewater, and his three Proclamations to be read, he marched for Bristol, where the inhabitants were inclined to receive him, had they not been awed by the Duke of Beaufort their Governour. He advanced however within three miles of the City, at the instance of some Bristol men, who assured him, he would be received in spite of the Governour and the garrison. But in the mean time, he had notice that the King's forces were advancing, which made him alter his resolution of attempting Bristol to that of retreating to Bridgewater. He marched therefore towards Bath, and after vainly summoning that City to surrender, he beat up one of the King's quarters [at Philip's Norton,] where lay a troop of horse, which were entirely defeated (1).

From thence he advanced to Frome, where he met with a cheerful reception. But unhappily for him, the King's party had found means a few days before to disarm all the Inhabitants, so that he was disappointed, his chief aim being to seize these arms for such of his men as wanted them. At Frome he heard of the Earl of Argyle's defeat, which threw him into a great consternation. However, he resolved to pursue his march, and return to Bridgewater. Whilst these things passed in the West, the King was preparing at London, with all possible diligence, for his defence against an enemy who could not but make him extremely uneasy. But he had not many regular troops, and those dispersed in several parts of the Kingdom. This obliged him to raise the Militia, particularly in the western counties, till the arrival of the six English and Scotch Regiments which were to come from Holland. On this occasion, the Prince of Orange his Son-in-law sent Monsieur Bentinck, with an offer of his person to head his army; but the King did not think proper to accept it. Mean while, as he had no great confidence in the Militia, he sent down his guards, and all the regular troops he could assemble, and formed a little army of two thousand Foot, and seven hundred horse and dragoons. He gave the command to Lewis Duras Earl of Feversham, brother of the Marshals Duras and de Lorge, and nephew to the late Mr. de Turanne. With these few troops, the Earl of Feversham encamped at a place called Sedgemoor near Bridgewater, whilst several parties of the Militia of the neighbouring counties lay about him, under the command of the Dukes of Beaufort, Somerset, Albemarle, and the Earl of Pembroke.

The Duke of Monmouth, who was come to Bridgewater, looking upon himself as besieged, and considering that the King's forces daily increased, whilst his own began to desert, held a Council of War, wherein it was resolved to march in the nights, and surprize the Earl of Feversham, who was encamped that day at Sedgemoor, and according to the report of the spies, little expected to be attacked. Pursuant to this resolution the Duke began his march about eleven at night with profound silence, and within two hours fell in with Dunbarton's regiment, which, lying in an advanced post, gave the alarm to the royal army, and by that they had time to draw up and receive their enemies. The particulars of the battle, which was fought about an hour after, are not well known. Thus much is certain, the Duke of Monmouth's horse commanded by the Lord Grey behaved very ill (2), though superior to the King's in number, and were routed at the first charge. The Duke of Monmouth, in the head of the foot, long fought with great bravery. But being deserted by his own, and attacked by the King's horse, his army was at last forced to take to flight. The loss of this battle was ascribed to the little experience or cowardice of the Lord Grey, who commanded the horse, and was even suspected of treachery. What confirmed this suspicion was, that being made prisoner in readily obtained the King's pardon. It is said moreover, that when he had so ill performed his duty, instead of endeavouring to rally the horse, he rode up to the Duke of Monmouth and told him, all was lost, and it was more than time to shift for himself (3).

This battle was fought the 6th of July at break of day. There were slain on the Duke of Monmouth's side three hundred men on the spot, a thousand in the pursuit, and as many taken prisoners. The Duke retiring out of the fight, could hardly rally fifty horse to secure his retreat. But these being quickly dispersed, he was obliged to fly on foot, accompanied only with a German Count, whom he had brought with him from Holland. The Lord Grey was taken on the morrow, and the day after, the Duke of Monmouth was found in a ditch covered with fern, with some green pease in his pocket. Probably he had eaten nothing else for two days. He was brought to the Lord Lumley, who immediately conveyed him to London.

No sooner was the Duke taken, but he believed himself lost, and yet he retained some hopes that the King would be moved by his submission and repentance, and the Queen Dowager would intercede for him. In this belief, he wrote to the King for pardon in the most submissive terms he could devise, and which he thought most apt to move his compassion. He writ also to the Queen Dowager, who really interceded for him, and prevailed with the King to see the unfortunate Duke. She made no doubt, that since the King had consented to see him, he intended to pardon him; but she was mistaken. The Duke being brought to the King's presence, threw himself at his feet, and begged his life in a very submissive or rather abject manner. The King, after asking him some questions, made him sign a declaration, whereby he owned, that the King his father assured him, he was never married to his mother. This done, the King told him, his crime was of too great a consequence to be forgiven, and therefore he must prepare to die. The Queen, who was present, is said to have insulted his misfortune in an unmerciful manner. The Duke seeing no hopes left, rose from the King's feet with an air of bravery, which would have better become him when he first came into his presence, and was carried to the Tower to prepare for death. The King's and Queen's behaviour on this occasion was thought very strange, Princes not being used to admit criminals to their presence, but when they design to grant them a pardon. I do not find in any Historian, that the Duke was proceeded against in the usual forms. So, probably, he was condemned by the King alone.

Till his execution the King ordered Turner Bishop of Ely to attend him, and prepare him to die. The Duke writ once more to the King for pardon, or at least for a longer time, and desired him to send him Dr. Tennison (4) or any other Divine. The King denied the two first articles of his request, and appointed Ken Bishop of Bath and Wells, to go and acquaint him; that he must die the next morning.

In the morning, July the 15th, Dr. Tennison and Dr. Hooper were brought to him, and attended him till the last hour of his life. By their exhortations they persuaded him to give it in writing, that the King his father told him, he was never married to his mother. He confessed also, that his invasion was a sin, but would never own it a rebellion. There was another point about which the two Divines could not receive from him any satisfaction, namely, his living with the Lady Herriot Wentworth, though he had a Duchess of his own, and his pretending to be lawfully married to her before God, alledging, that his first marriage was null, as being too young when he gave his consent. All the pains taken by the two Doctors to convince him of the falsehood of this opinion were fruitless, nay, he chose rather to deprive himself of the Communion, than own his engagements with that Lady to be unlawful.

When he was on the Scaffold, he declared, he died a Protestant of the Church of England. But Turner and Ken stopped him, and said, that to be a member of the Church of England he must believe the doctrine of Non-Resistance. He answered, he could not help it, but he did not believe it, yet he approved the doctrine of the Church in all other things. At last, he laid his head on the block, which was not severed from his body untill the fifth stroke. Thus died the Duke of Monmouth, who had long been the people's idol; and whom James always considered as a very formidable rival. Charles II. died very fearfully to see the Duke his brother from the uneasiness created him by this competitor. But though James had mounted the

(3) But, after all, it seems there was no ground for supposing him of treachery. And as for his being pardoned, it was done, that the Earl of Pembroke might enjoy his Estate, which could not be without sparing that Lord's Life, since his Estate was entailed. See Kennet, p. 437. throne, the Duke of Monmouth endangered his Crown. Neither the victory at Sedgemoor, nor Argyle's defeat in Scotland, could be ascribed to the valour or conduct of the King, but to mere chance, or rather to the direction of Providence, which, for the welfare of England, was pleased to use proper means to be more plainly distinguished.

The King being thus freed from his greatest fears, gave himself over entirely to the passion of revenge on those who directly or indirectly had assisted the Duke of Monmouth. To that end, the Lord Chief-Justice Jeffries was sent with four Judges assistants, into the West, with a special commission of Oyer and Terminer, to try the late rebels; and Major-General Kirk was ordered to attend him with a body of troops to keep the people in awe. It was not possible for the King to find in the whole Kingdom, two men more destitute of Religion, Honour, and Humanity. They were two cruel and merciless tygers, that delighted in blood. I shall relate here but some few of their barbarous actions: For a particular account of all their proceedings would be too great a digression.

At Winchester, the widow of the Lord Lisle (1), one of King Charles I's Judges, was brought before him to be tried. Her crime was the harbouring and concealing Mr. Hicks a Presbyterian Minister (2) of the Duke of Monmouth's party, though his name was in no proclamation, and one Nethorpe who was a stranger to her. The Jury not satisfied with the evidence, brought her in not guilty. But Jeffries in great fury, sent them out again. They found her not guilty three times: But Jeffries threatening them with an attainder of Treason, she was brought in guilty, and executed accordingly, being above seventy years old (3).

At Dorchester, Jeffries, to shorten his work, told thirty prisoners, that if they expected any favour, they should plead guilty. But as they did not care to take that course, he condemned twenty-nine, who were immediately executed.

In another place, two hundred persons being indicted, Jeffries positively promised a pardon to such as should plead guilty, and of the two hundred, he ordered four-score to be hanged.

In fine, not to enlarge on such a scene of horror, it suffices to say, that Jeffries condemned five hundred persons, whereof two hundred and thirty were executed, according to the lowest computation (4), and their quarters set up in the highways. Jeffries himself gloried in this barbarity, and boasted, that he had hanged more men than all the Judges of England since William the Conqueror. And yet he would have carried his cruelty farther, had not many purchased his favour with their estates. One Mr. Prideaux (5) alone, gave him fourteen thousand pounds to save his life. As for those that had not money enough to buy pardons at his price, they were either hanged, or cruelly whipped, or sold for slaves into the American Plantations.

Kirk was not behind Jeffries either in cruelty or infolence. Immediately after the Duke of Monmouth's defeat, being sent to Taunton, he caused nineteen persons, by his own authority, without any trial or process, and without suffering their wives or children to speak with them, to be hanged with pipes playing, drums beating, and trumpets sounding. It was this doubtless, that made him worthy to be an assistant to Jeffries.

In the same town of Taunton, Kirk having invited his officers to dinner, ordered thirty condemned persons to be hanged whilst they were at table, namely, ten in a health to the King, ten in a health to the Queen, and ten in a health to Jeffries. But one action he committed in another town is beyond all imagination. A young girl throwing herself at his feet to beg her father's (6) life, he drew her in to prostitute herself to him, with the promise of granting her request. But having satisfied his brutal lust, he was so inhuman, as out of the window, to present the credulous girl with the sight of her father hanging on the Sign-post. This sad spectacle so affected the poor girl, that she fell distracted.

Father Orleans, who writ from the mouth of James II, not being able to deny these barbarous executions, endeavours to excuse them two ways. He says first, that the King was informed of them too late to prevent them, and that the great services performed by Jeffries and Kirk, prevailed with him to spare them (7). He says, in the next place, that the King made amends for those injustices, as far as lay in his power, by the general pardon he afterwards granted. But it is easy to see, how vain these excuses are, if it is considered, that when Kirk was charged with these cruelties, he answered, that Jeffries and himself acted far short of the King's instructions. Again, the King was so little displeased with Jeffries's conduct, that at his desire he made him Lord-Chancellor (8), the Lord-Keeper North dying while the Chief Justice was exercising his cruelties in the West. As for the general pardon, it was not published till several months after all these executions, when there were no more guilty to be found. The Court must have believed, that very few could have the benefit of the pardon, since a company of young girls, from ten to twelve years old, were infected by name, who, with chaplets of flowers on their head, had presented a bible to the Duke of Monmouth, at his entry into Taunton.

It was not only in the western counties that the King gave fenible proofs of his revengeful temper. The city of London was witness also of several executions in Oldbarn, and among others, of Elizabeth Gaunt, who was publicly burnt for harbouring one of the Duke of Monmouth's adherents (9). Six men were hanged at Tyburn as traitors, for crimes of the like nature, and what is more strange, without any previous trial.

But the execution that made most noise, was that of Alderman Cornish. This man, who was Sheriff of London, at the time of the discovery of the popish Plot, had been very active on that occasion, which was grown an unpardonable crime in the present reign. Cornish, whose name had hardly been mentioned in the Rye-plot, not suspecting any thing, and following his profession, was seized on Tuesday the 13th of October, and hurried to Newgate without being allowed the use of pen, ink, and paper. The next Saturday evening, he had notice that he was indicted of High-treason, and that his trial was to be on Monday morning. On the morrow, he sent a petition to the King for a longer time, alleging, that he did not even know wherein consisted the treason he was accused of. The King referred his petition to the Judges, who absolutely denied his request. He was charged with conspiring against King Charles II, with the Lord Russell, and the rest who had been executed for that affair, and condemned upon the evidence of the same witnesses, though he showed, in their depositions, manifest contradictions, and visible improbabilities. But it was resolved to revenge the death of those who suffered for the popish Plot, upon such as had been most active against the Papists. Cornish was executed as a traitor, the 23d of October. But the Parliament, in the year 1688, reversed the sentence, as well as those of some others, who had unjustly suffered in the beginning of this reign.

The last that died for the Protestant Plot, was Charles Bateman, a noted Surgeon, who was accused of holding several seditious discourses at that time against the Government. But many people believed, his chief crime consisted in his compassion to Titus Oates, having constantly attended him after his cruel scourgings, and used all his skill to cure his wounds. This man, who did not expect to be accused, grew distracted during his imprisonment, and the Court was so well satisfied of it, that his son was permitted to make his defence for him. But his condition did not prevent his being condemned and executed.

The King was then in a flourishing state. His two greatest enemies were destroyed, and by his revenge upon those that had offended him, as well in his own, as in his brother's reign, he had struck such a terror into the whole Kingdom, that no man dared so much as to think of resisting him. The Whigs were entirely humbled, the Tories were triumphant, and the doctrine of Passive Obedience and Non-Resistance was openly preached, as an essential article of the faith of the Church of England. The King had a Parliament, which sought only to give him marks of their zeal, and ever ready to supply him with money for all extraordinary occasions, without his being obliged to meddle with his revenue. His army greatly contributed to make him feared, and keep the people in awe. Scotland was entirely subdued, and the managers of the affairs of that Kingdom seemed only to mind the enlarging of the Prerogative royal. As for Ireland, it will presently be seen, that he had not stayed till now to put that Kingdom in the state he desired. In fine, the Princes of Europe considering him

new Projects

What therefore did James II. want to render his happiness complete? One thing, which affected him more than all the rest, but which he could not hope to obtain, without hazarding all his other advantages. This was, to make all his subjects Papists, or at least, to force them to pretend to be so. But this was not a thing easy to be accomplished, by reason of the great superiority of the number of the Protestants in England and Scotland. Nevertheless, he attempted it, imagining, that the opportunity was too favorable to be neglected. But as he used at first very gross artifices, obvious to all the world, he was obliged to support them with force, and to that end, he was to set himself above the laws. These two projects, of establishing an arbitrary Government, and destroying the Protestant Religion, were not of a late date. Every one knew they had long been in hand. But the English did not expect, the King would violate his repeated promises to support and defend the Religion established by law: Nay, some were so strangely blind, as to think it impossible for the King to break his word. But they were afterwards too fenible of their error. All the rest of this reign confists only in the means used by the King to execute this design, and in the measures taken by the English at last to stop his career. I must begin with the first of these points, before I proceed to the second.

Kennet,
p. 434.

Reasons which should have caused him to hold the King from following them.

Many things should have diverted the King from forming such a project. First, the difficulty of the execution, which might have been easily foreseen. For if it is considered, that the Papists of England are not the thousandth part of the nation, it must be thought strange, that with this thousandth part it is attempted to compel the rest to change their Religion. I say compel, for what likelihood is there that, without compulsion, a whole nation may be persuaded to quit their Religion and embrace another, for which they have the utmost abhorrence? It will, perhaps, be said, that James had almost accomplished it, and that without a foreign aid, the English would have been forced to submit to the yoke. But the inconsiderableness of this aid, demonstrates, he was yet very far from his ends.

Secondly, As to the absolute power, which must have been established, in order to introduce a Religion contrary to that of the whole Kingdom, he was much mistaken in supposing, that France would lend him a powerful aid for that purpose. For it was not the interest of Lewis XIV. to render the King of England absolute, but only to raise commotions in that Kingdom, which by keeping England employed, should facilitate the execution of his ambitious designs.

Welwood,
p. 133, &c.

Thirdly, If the examples of Edward II. and Richard II, as too remote from his time, made no impression upon him, he should have considered that of the King his Father, who, for endeavouring to stretch the Prerogative royal, and for being only suspected of intending to introduce Popery, lost his head on the scaffold. It has been seen, that Charles I. in the time of his afflictions, writ to the Prince his eldest son to take warning by him, not to assume more power than belonged to him. Moreover, when he was brought on the scaffold, he took off his George, and gave it to Dr. Juxon, saying, Remember. The Council of State being willing to know the meaning of that expression, Juxon answered, That the King immediately before his coming out to the place of execution, had charged him to carry to the Prince his George, with these two last commands, That he should forgive his murderers; and, If ever he came to the Crown, he should so govern, as not to force them upon extremities. The Queen-Dowager, as she was going into Somerset-house, after the restoration of Charles II, said, Had I known the English some years since, as well as I do now, I should never have been forced to leave this palace. In fine, Charles II, when at the point death, told the Duke his brother, not to think of introducing the Roman Catholic Religion into England, it being a dangerous and impracticable thing. These warnings, which could not be suspected by the King, ought to have made him seriously consider what he was going to do.

Puffendorf

Fourthly, Don Pedro Ronquillo the Spanish Ambassador, at his first audience after the King's accession to the Crown, told him, That he saw several Priests about him, who would importune him to alter the established Religion; but wished his Majesty not to hearken to their advice, for if he did, he would have reason to repent of it when it was too late. The King taking ill the Ambassador's freedom, asked him in a passion, Whether, in Spain, the King advised with his Confessors? Yes, Sir, replied Don Pedro, and that is the reason our affairs go so ill.

Ibid.

Fifthly, Pope Innocent XI, in a letter to the King upon his coming to the Crown, told him, That he was highly pleased with his zeal for the Catholic Religion: But was afraid he would carry it too far, and instead of contributing to his own greatness, and the advancement of Religion, he would do both himself and the Catholic Church the greatest prejudices, by attempting that which could never succeed.

Lastly, It was manifest, that the King could hope to succeed in his undertaking but by force, and that this force wholly lay in his army and fleet. But was it not a strange project, to attempt to reduce by force a Protestant Kingdom to the Catholic Religion, with a Protestant army, and a fleet, whose commanders and mariners were Protestants? He had but too much reason to perceive his error, when it was too late to remedy it.

These considerations, examples, and warnings, were ineffectual against the impetuous zeal of the King, and the importunities of those who were admitted to his secret counsels, and particularly the Queen. He attempted at once two things equally difficult, namely, to set himself above the laws, and to alter the established Religion. When I say he attempted it, I mean, openly and bare-faced, for it was no new design. He had formed it long since, and, not to carry back the beginning of it too far, it suffices to observe, that the execution of it had been privately labouring about twenty years; and that moreover, James did but pursue the scheme he had perhaps himself framed, when Duke of York. It was not therefore the Duke of Monmouth's defeat that inspired James II. with the thoughts of becoming absolute, and altering the established Religion. His good fortune to conquer that rival, served only to put him upon hastening the execution of his projects. This evidently appears, when it is considered, what passed in Ireland since the beginning of his reign.

About two months after the King's accession to the Crown, he recalled the Duke of Ormond from Ireland, and appointed two Lords Justices to govern that Kingdom (1). The Duke of Ormond was not a proper instrument for the King's purposes. At the same time, the Privy-Council of Ireland was dissolved, and a new one appointed, into which were admitted several known Papists. Soon after, their number was so increased, that they made the major part of the Council, so that the Protestants no longer assented, that they might not authorize by their presence, such resolutions as it was in vain to oppose. When the Council was thus modelled, nothing was heard in Ireland, but impeachments against the Protestants, for being concerned in the Rye-Plot, and afterwards, for holding correspondence with the Duke of Monmouth, or his adherents. The moment any person was accused, he was sent to prison by the Council, without being admitted to bail, or brought to a trial. The Earl of Granard, one of the Lords Justices, and a good Protestant, weary of being an instrument to those acts of injustice, desired to be dismissed. But the King denied him, and sent him a letter under his own hand, assuring him, that nothing should be acted prejudicial to the Protestant interest. But it soon appeared, that the King never meant to perform this promise. For, very shortly after, he resolved to have a standing army of Papists in Ireland, and to disarm the Protestants. This last article was first put in practice. The King writ to the Lords Justices, "That there was reason to believe that the rebellion of Monmouth had been of that spreading contagion, as to reach Ireland, and therefore it was not safe to have the arms of the Militia dispersed abroad; but they would be in greater readiness for the use of the Militia, and the defence of the country, to have them deposited in the several stores of each county." Upon this order, the Lords Justices published a proclamation, agreeable to the King's desire, and the City of Dublin having brought in their arms, their example was followed by all the country.

Kennet,
p. 447.

The Protestants being thus disarmed, means were devised to turn the Protestant, into a Catholic, army. For that purpose, Colonel Richard Talbot, a violent Papist, was empowered to cashier such officers and soldiers as he thought fit. He was the man of all others most odious to the English Protestants in Ireland. It is observable, that Titus Oates in his Narrative of the popish plot, named him as designed for this very service. So, when the event was seen to agree so well with what Oates had related, many could not help thinking, either that he had been well informed, or was a good prophet.

Talbot having received this commission, broke many officers, on pretence that they had born arms against the King during the troubles, or were sons and relations of those who had served the Parliament of Cromwell. It must be observed, that all this passed in Ireland, before or immediately after the Duke of Monmouth's defeat, at a time when the King had not yet manifested his designs in England.

(1) The Archbishop of Armagh, and Arthur Forbes Earl of Granard. The Archbishop was so compliant to the Court, that even his Religion came to be suspected. However he was not thought thorough-paced: So Sir Charles Porter was made Chancellor in his Room, Burton, p. 654.

1685. That I may not be obliged frequently to return to what was transacting in Ireland, I shall briefly add here, that about the end of the year, Talbot came into England, and was made Earl of Tyrconnel, and Lieutenant-General of the Irish army, and shortly after, Henry Earl of Clarendon was appointed Lord Lieutenant of Ireland.

The Parliament of England, after several adjournments, meeting at last on the 9th of November, the King made the following Speech to both Houses.

My Lords and Gentlemen,
AFTER the storm that seemed to be coming upon us when we parted last, I am glad to meet you all again in so great peace and quietness; God Almighty be praised, by whose blessing that rebellion was suppressed; but when I reflect what an inconsiderable number of men began it, and how long they carried it on without any opposition, I hope every body will be convinced, that the Militia, which hath hitherto been so much depended on, is not sufficient for such occasions; and that there is nothing but a good force of well-disciplined troops in constant pay, that can defend us, from such as either at home or abroad, are disposed to disturb us. And in truth, my concern for the peace and quiet of my Subjects, as well as for the safety of the Government, made me think it necessary to encrease the number to the proportion I have done; this I owed as well to the Honour, as to the Security of the nation, whose reputation was so infinitely exposed to all our neighbours, by having lain open to this late wretched attempt, that it is not to be repaired without keeping such a body of men on foot, that none may ever have the thought again of finding us so miserably unprovided. It is for the support of this great charge, which is now more than double to what it was (1), that I ask your assistance, in giving me a supply answerable to the expence it brings along with it; and I cannot doubt, but what I have begun, so much for the honour and defence of the Government, will be continued by you with all the cheerfulness and readiness, that is requisite for a work of so great importance.
Let no man take exception, that there are some officers in the army not qualified, according to the late Tests, for their employments: The Gentlemen, I must tell you, are most of them well known to me; and having formerly served me on several occasions, and always approved the loyalty of their principles by their practice, I think them fit now to be employed under me; and will deal plainly with you, that after having had the benefit of their services in such time of need and danger, I will neither expose them to disgrace, nor myself to the want of them, if there should be another rebellion to make them necessary to me. I am afraid some men may be so wicked, to hope and expect, that a difference may happen between you and me upon this occasion: But when you consider, what advantages have risen to us in a few months, by the good understanding we have hitherto had; what wonderful effects it hath already produced in the change of the whole scene of affairs abroad, so much more to the honour of the nation, and the figure it ought to make in the world; and that nothing can hinder a further progress in this way to all our satisfactions, but fears and jealousies amongst ourselves; I will not apprehend that such a misfortune can befall us, as a division, or but a coldness between me and you; nor that any thing can shake you in your steadiness and loyalty to me, who, by God's blessing, will ever make you all returns of kindness and protection, with a resolution to venture even my own life in the defence of the true interest of this Kingdom."

This Speech equally surprized both Houses of Parliament, and the whole Kingdom, when it came to be published. The English had often ventured their lives in the defence of their Laws and Liberties, of which they then believed themselves secure, as well by the constitution of the Government, as by the King's solemn promise, but they beheld their Laws openly attacked in the most sensible part. Many of those who had most warmly opposed the Exclusion-Bill, began to open their eyes, and perceive, that the jealousies and fears of the Whig Parliaments were too well-grounded, and that it was difficult to reconcile the interests of a Roman Catholic King, with those of a Protestant Kingdom. This was what the Whigs had in vain declared in the late reign. Instead of duly weighing their reasons, the Tories had run into the other extreme, nay, had expected to be gainers by setting the Duke of York on the throne. But this first publick step of the King, made them proceed for the future with a little more caution, though by their principles they were not yet obliged to take such measures as would have been necessary.

It was warmly debated in the House of Lords, whether they should give the King thanks for his Speech. Some were utterly against it; whereupon the Marquis of Hallifax said, They had now more reason than ever to give thanks to his Majesty, since he had dealt so plainly with them, and discovered what he would be at. Nevertheless, it was resolved by the majority, that the King should be thanked. But however, the Bishop of London moved, that his Majesty's Speech might be debated, and though it was unusual in the House, the 23d of the month was appointed to take the Speech into consideration, with which the King was highly displeased.

When the Commons were returned to their House, the King's Speech was ordered to be read, which was followed with a long and profound silence. At last, the Earl of Middleton moved for an address of thanks to the King for his Speech. This motion produced a second silence, which was broke by the Lord Cassleton, who more bold than the rest plainly declared against thanking the King. Wherefore, as there would probably be some difficulty in the matter, the debate was adjourned till the 12th of the month. To give the Reader a clear notion of the difficulties which occurred in the King's demand, I shall make here some observations which perhaps will not be foreign to the purpose.

The House of Commons, as I said, consisted then of Tory members, there being very few Whigs, or if any, their number was not considerable. Now the Tories had a very different notion of the regal Power, from that of the Whigs. They had, as we have seen, declared in the late reign for Passive-Obedience and Non-Resistance, and the Church made it an article of faith. Nevertheless it may be said, when they introduced this doctrine without any limitation, they did not foresee all the consequences. It was properly to contradict the principles of the Whigs, who ran into the other extreme. As they imagined, that Charles II. and James II. were for them, they fancied they could not stretch the royal Prerogative too much, in the belief, that these two Princes would exert it only against their adversaries. According to this principle, King James's demand for a standing army of fifteen thousand men in time of peace, did not seem contrary to their interest, tho' the Parliaments had ever been extremely averse to a standing army, which served only to increase the regal Power. But what the King did by his sole authority, in employing popish officers in this army, was a thing as much against the Tory as the Whig interest. It was easy to perceive, of what dangerous consequences it might be to the Protestant Religion in general, as well Episcopalian as Presbyterian, and these consequences were the more to be dreaded, as what passed in Ireland plainly discovered the King's intentions. Besides, the power assumed by the King, to exempt the popish officers from taking the Test, was directly contrary to the Liberties of the Kingdom as well as to Religion.

When therefore the King's Speech was debated the 12th of November in the House of Commons, such members as were not of the same principles with the rigid and violent Tories, spoke with great freedom, representing the inconveniences of a standing army in time of peace (2), and moved for the new modelling the Militia, so as to render them of use upon occasion. They were suffered to talk as much as they pleased, but when the question was put for a supply to be given to the King, it was carried in the affirmative. It is true, some one having moved that these words might be added, towards the support of the additional forces, they were rejected, that the House might not appear to approve of the augmentation of the regular troops, and instead thereof it pass'd, that the House be moved to bring in a Bill to make the Militia useful. By this they would have had it believed, that the Parliament reserved to themselves the power of breaking the regular troops, and establishing a good Militia in their room. But, doubtless, it was to hinder the people from being alarmed, if they saw the Parliament approve of maintaining an army in time of peace. For, after all, a supply was given the King for the maintenance of this army.

As to the sum which was to be granted, the Courtiers moved for twelve hundred thousand pounds. Others expressed against the exorbitancy of such a sum, and were for reducing it to four hundred thousand pounds, alleging, that it would be enough to maintain the additional forces two years, till the Militia should be made useful. They represented, that they had already given Customs and Excises for his Majesty's life, which amounted to six mil-

The Lords moved to give thanks for his Speech. Some were utterly against it; whereupon the Marquis of Halifax said, They had now more reason than ever to give thanks to his Majesty, since he had dealt so plainly with them, and discovered what he would be at. Nevertheless, it was resolved by the majority, that the King should be thanked. At last, after great debates it was resolved, that a supply of seven hundred thousand pounds should be granted to the King. It was evident therefore, that the maintenance of an army of fifteen thousand men was not what most displeased the Commons in the King's Speech.

But the affair of the popish officers was of such a nature, that it concerned the Tory no less than the Whig party. It was easy to see the great danger of the Protestant Religion, if the Parliament, after having agreed to a standing army, should farther consent to the King's employing as many Papists as he pleased. The Commons thought therefore, that on this occasion it was necessary to set some bounds to Passive-Obedience, though till now this doctrine had been maintained without any restriction, because it was not imagined, that the King would attack Religion and the Laws. One of the members speaking on this subject, represented very strongly, "That his Majesty, on his first accession to the Crown, told them, He had been misinformed, and that he would preserve the Government in the Church and State, now established by Law, and maintain them in all their just Rights, and Privileges: That he overjoyed at this, they ran hastily to him, and were so forward to give, that the King's ministers put their stop to it: That they ought not to forget, that there was a Bill of Exclusion debated in that House; and that the arguments for it were, That they should, in case of a popish successor, have a popish army: That they saw the Act of the Test already broken; but prayed them to remember what the late Lord Chancellor told them when King Charles passed that Act: By this Act, said he, you are provided against Popery, that no Papist can possibly creep into any employment: That he was greatly afflicted at the breach of their Liberties, and seeing so great a difference between his last Speech, and those heretofore made, he could not believe but this was made by some other advice: That what the thing struck at there was their ail; and that he wondered there had been any men so desperate, as to take any employment without being qualified for it: And concluded to have a standing army voted destructive to the Country." During these debates the Court-party were not idle. They represented with great strength, the inconveniencies of not complying with the King's desires. The result was, the appointing a committee to draw up the following Address, which was presented to the King the 17th of November.

Most gracious Sovereign,

"WE your Majesty's most loyal and faithful Subjects, the Commons in Parliament assembled, do, in the first place, as in duty bound, return your Majesty our most humble and hearty thanks, for your great care and conduct in suppressing the late Rebellion, which threatened the overthrow of this Government both in Church and State, to the extirpation of our Religion as by law established, which is most dear unto us, and which your Majesty hath been pleased to give us REPEATED ASSURANCES you will always defend and maintain; which, with all grateful hearts we shall ever acknowledge. We further crave leave to acquaint your Majesty, that we have, with all duty and readiness, taken into our consideration your Majesty's gracious Speech to us: And as to that part of it relating to the officers in the army, not qualified for their employments, according to an Act of Parliament made in the 25th year of the reign of your royal brother, entitled, An Act for preventing dangers which may happen from popish recusants; we do, out of our bounden duty, humbly represent unto your Majesty, that these officers cannot by Law be capable of their employments; and that the incapacities they bring upon themselves that way, can no way be taken off but by an Act of Parliament: Therefore, out of that great reverence and duty we owe unto your Majesty, who have been graciously pleased to take notice of their services to your Majesty, we are preparing a Bill to pass both Houses, for your royal assent, to indemnify them from the penalties they have now incurred: And because the continuing them in their employments, may be taken to be a dispensing with that Law, without an Act of Parliament, the consequences of which is of the greatest concern to the rights of your Majesty's Subjects, and to all the Laws made for the security of their Religion: We therefore, the Knights, Citizens, and Burgesses, of your Majesty's House of Commons, do most humbly beseech your Majesty, that you would be most graciously pleased to give such directions therein, that no apprehensions or jealousies may "remain in the hearts of your Majesty's most loyal Subjects."

This address being presented to the King by the Speaker, attended by the whole House, his Majesty gave them this answer.

Gentlemen, I did not expect such an address from the House of Commons: For having so lately recommended to your consideration the great advantage a good understanding between us had produced in a very short time, and given you warning of fears and jealousies amongst ourselves; I had cause to hope, That the reputation God had blessed me with in the world, would have sealed and confirmed a good confidence in you of me, and of all that I say to you. But however you proceed on your part, I will be steady in all my Promises I have made you; and be just in my word in this, and all my other Speeches.

This answer, though pretty obscure, so surprized the Commons, that when it was read in the House, they kept a profound silence for a considerable time. At last it was moved by one of the members, that a particular day might be appointed to consider of the King's answer. This motion was seconded by Mr. Coke [Burgess for Derby] who added, He hoped they were all true Englishmen, and not to be frightened out of their duty by a few hard words. Though this speech was very consistent with the freedom of a House of Commons, the majority however were pleased to look upon Mr. Coke as an incendiary, who intended to sow discord between the King and the Commons, and voted him to be sent to the Tower. Moreover, the House, to make amends in some measure for the offence they had given the King, proceeded to ways and means towards raising the seven hundred thousand pounds before voted. But they stopped not there. To shew the King that they sought all possible ways to content him, besides a Bill to indemnify the Popish officers from the penalties they had already incurred, they resolved to offer another to the King, to qualify such a number of those officers to serve in the army as he should think fit. All this demonstrates, it was with regret that the House swerv'd from the principle of Passive-Obedience and Non-Resistance.

In the mean time, the Lords received Petitions from [Thomas Grey] Earl of Stamford and [Henry Booth] Lord Delamere, representing, that these two Peers were committed to the Tower in July last, upon a general accusation of treason, kept close prisoners, and denied the use of pen, ink, and paper. These petitions obliged the Lords to send to the King, to know the reason why these two Peers were imprisoned. The King answered by the Lord Chancellor, that they were committed for high-treason, and that he had given orders for a commission of Oyer and Terminer to try the Lord Delamere in Cheshire, where the crime was committed. But as he had given no orders about the Earl of Stamford's trial, the Lords appointed him to be tried by his Peers, to which the King consented.

Within a few days, on the 20th of November, the King finding it would be very difficult to obtain his desires of the Commons concerning the Popish officers, prorogued the Parliament till the 10th of February, after a session but of eleven days. The King lost by the prorogation, the seven hundred thousand pounds voted by the Commons. But he did not want it, considering the vast sums they had liberally granted him. This prorogation, which was followed by several others, and at length by the dissolution of the Parliament, the last in this reign, is a clear demonstration of two things. First, that the King considered the affair of the Popish officers in the army, as of great moment, since he chose rather to lose seven hundred thousand pounds, than see his pretended right to employ them contested by the Parliament. The second is, the excessive compliance shewn the King by the Commons, in enabling him to maintain an army, employ Popish officers, and, in a word, to have no occasion for a Parliament. For from hence sprung all the evils which afflicted England during the rest of this reign.

About a month after the prorogation of the Parliament, the Lord Delamere was brought to his trial by his Peers, though the King had before resolved to have him proceeded against in another manner. The Lord Howard was the first witness produced against him. But though he gave a large account of the Duke of Monmouth's conspiracy, he deposed nothing positive against the Lord Delamere. The second witness was Lord Grey, at which every one was surprized, it not being known that he was pardoned. This gave occasion to think he was in great favour with the King. But his evidence tended more to prove in general the Duke of Monmouth's rebellion, than the guilt of the prisoner in particular. One Saxon was the only witness that swore to the Lord Delamere's correspondence with the Duke of Monmouth. But as he was a person of very bad

As for the Earl of Stanford he was admitted to bail, and tho' nothing could be proved against him, he thought fit to lay hold on the Proclamation of pardon which was published shortly after. This pardon appeared not till the end of the year, after the executions of a great number of persons. It was moreover clogged with so many exceptions, that the King was not much thanked for it.

James, in this first year of his reign, bestowed honours and dignities upon several of his favorites and adherents, and advanced others to high offices. [Henry Bennet] Earl of Arlington dying July 28, his place of Lord Chamberlain was given to [John Sheffield] Earl of Mulgrave, who became one of the chief favorites in this reign. [Laurence Hyde] Earl of Rochester was made Lord Treasurer, and [Henry] Earl of Clarendon his elder Brother Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. [Robert Spencer] Earl of Sunderland, principal Secretary of State, was declar'd Lord President of the Council, and from that time became Prime-Minister of State.

The person most known abroad, that died this year, was Sir John Marham, eminent for his great skill in ancient History and Chronology. He departed this life in the eighty third year of his age (1).

The year 1686, to which we are now to proceed, was wholly spent, as well as the next, in the execution of the King's two grand projects, namely of making himself absolute, and establishing Popery. These two projects could not but keep equal pace. For the King being a Papist, his chief aim in rendering himself absolute was to alter the Religion of the Kingdom, and on the other side, he could not introduce Popery, but by setting himself above the Laws.

Before things were carried any farther in England, he believed it proper to be assured first of Scotland and Ireland. As for Scotland, the managers there were entirely disposed to comply with the King's will. The late Parliament, besides the Acts before-mentioned, passed one (2) wherein it was declared, "That they owe all their blessings to the sacred race of their glorious Kings, and to the solid, absolute authority wherewith they were invested by the first and fundamental laws of their Monarchy:— And therefore they again declare to the world, That they abhor and detest not only the authors and actors of all preceding rebellions against their Sovereign, but also all principles and positions which are contrary or derogatory to the King's Sacred, Supreme, Sovereign, Absolute Power and Authority, which none, whether particular persons or collective bodies, can participate of any manner of way, or upon any pretext, but in dependence on him, and by commission from him, &c." They passed another Act, "To confirm and approve whatever had been done by his Majesty's Privy Council, Justice-Court, and those commissioned by them, in banishing, imprisoning, or fining such as refused to take and swear the Oath of Allegiance; and to assert the royal prerogative in the utmost extent of them."

If what passed in Scotland in the reign of Charles I. and during the Interregnum, be remembered, it will be easily perceived, this was not the general sense of the Scots, but only the opinion of a Parliament devoted to the King, and which visibly abused their authority, to establish a form of Government directly contrary to the old constitution.

Encouraged by these great advances, the King summoned the Parliament of Scotland, to assemble the 29th of April this year, and wrote a letter to them, wherein, "He recommends to their special care, his innocent Roman Catholic Subjects, who had always been assiduous to the Crown in the worst of rebellions and usurpations, tho' they lay under discouragements hardly to be named: These he most heartily recommended to them; to the end, that as they had given good experience of their true loyalty and peaceable behaviour, so, by their assistance, they might have the protection of his laws, not suffering them to be under obligations, which their Religion could not admit of; by doing of which, they would give a demonstration of their duty and affection towards him, and do him most acceptable service. And this love he expected they would show to their brethren, as they saw him an indulgent Father to his people."

The Earl of Murray, Lord High-Commissioner, seconded this letter, with a particular account of the many advantages the King intended to procure his realm of Scotland, chiefly with respect to trade. He also endeavoured to persuade them, that what the King desired, tended as much to the honour and welfare of his subjects of Scotland, as to his own satisfaction. He concluded with saying, "By this you will see yourselves the best and most affectionate subjects, to the best, the incomparable, and most heroic Prince in the world."

When the King's letter, and the Lord Commissioner's Kennet Speech came to be considered in the Parliament, some P-447 members, without looking farther, were for complying with the King's desires. But others, in greater numbers, moved and prevailed to have a committee appointed, to examine the Statutes against the Papists. The committee finding, the Statutes prohibited only the public exercise of the popish Religion, drew up a Bill to allow them the exercise of their Religion in private. But when this Bill was presented to the Parliament, it met with so much opposition, that the Lord-Commissioner thought fit to adjourn the debate to another time, till he had received instructions from Court. The King sent him orders to dissolve, or at least prorogue the Parliament, and some months after, by his sole authority, he established liberty of conscience in Scotland.

Affairs in Ireland were upon another foot. The King's will met with no opposition there, and though the Lord Lieutenant was a Protestant, his credit and authority were insufficient to put a stop to the acts of injustice committed against those of his Religion. The new Earl of Tyrconnel was no sooner returned to Dublin with the title of Lieutenant-General of the army, but he began again to break the Protestant officers and soldiers, and put Roman Catholics in their places; without vouchsafing to ask for the Lord-Lieutenant's order (3). This drew a quarrel between them, wherein Tyrconnel behaved very haughtily, ever saying, he did nothing but by the King's express order. When he had modelled the army according to the King's mind, he went over into England, where, by means of the Queen, and Father Petre the Jesuit, he supplanted the Earl of Clarendon, and was appointed Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland. Upon his arrival at Dublin, he endeavoured by a proclamation to dispel the fears of the Protestants, who law themselves, to their great trouble, in subjection to a Catholic. But his actions corresponded not with his promises. Wherefore, a great number of Protestants, chose rather to quit their estates in Ireland, and withdraw into England, than remain under the Government of one so justly odious to them. On the other hand, the English merchants who traded in Ireland, withdrew their effects, and by that the Kingdom was reduced to great extremities. But all these disadvantages were compensated by the hopes of rooting out the Protestant Religion in that country.

But it was chiefly in England that the King desired to establish Popery and arbitrary Power. For, as I said, one of those things could not advance without the other. If he had only aimed at absolute power, without meddling with Religion, in all appearance, he would have easily succeeded, since passive obedience was in a manner established, and now reckoned an essential doctrine of the Church of England, the members whereof made the body of the nation, and were possessed of all the offices and places of trust. But as he had already discovered, that if he wished to be freed from the yoke of the laws, it was chiefly to establish his Religion, the Parliament, however devoted to him in all other respects, had not been so compliant as to abandon the interest of Religion. Notwithstanding this refusal, he hoped to attain his ends, first, by causing the Judges to give it as their opinion, that he had a power to dispense with the laws. Secondly, by gaining the members of Parliament by degrees, being resolved to have no fession till he had accomplished that design. In England, as in other places, there are men always ready to sacrifice the publick, to their private interest, and there were but too many, on the present occasion, even among the Clergy themselves.

Dr. Carterwright, Dean of Rippon, speaking, in a Sermon, of the King's promises made to the Parliament, which were then the common topic of discourse and complaint, said, "That the King's promises were free donatives, and ought not to be too strictly examined or urged; and that they must leave his Majesty to explain his own meaning in them." The King was so delighted with this gloss, that he rewarded the author with the Bishoprick of Chester, as an encouragement to other Clergymen to follow so good an example.

As for the Judges, the King took care to send for them one by one, and talk with them privately in his closet (4), in order to persuade them to declare for his dispensing power, in

A Call of Serjants Kennet.
At the same time, the King made a call of Serjants at Law, among whom were several Catholics, one of whom was knighted (3), and a little after, another Lawyer of the same Religion was made a Judge (4).

And in the Privy-Council.
The Privy-Council also underwent the like alteration, the King having received into it five zealous Catholics, namely, [the Earl of Powis,] the Lord Arundel of Wardour, and the Lord Bellasis, (who had been long confined in the Tower, being accused of the popish plot) [Henry Jermyn] Lord Dover, and the Earl of Tyrconnel. He likewise admitted the new Bishop of Chester, and Dr. Parker Bishop of Oxford, a reputed Papist. All these changes clearly discovered the King's intentions.

The Judges give their opinion that the King may dispense with the Law.
But it was not long before he gave more signal marks of them. It has been remembered, that he assumed a power to dispense with the observation of the Test-Act in his Catholic officers. The Parliament's refusal of their consent to this innovation, only exasperated the King, and made him resolve to exempt from the penal Laws all his subjects in general, and consequently the Papists. But as this was directly against law, he undertook to show, by the means of his corrupt Judges, That a power in the King to dispense with law, was law. For this purpose he took care first to have papers dispersed through the Kingdom, to prove this pretended right, and to prepare the people for his designs (5). At last in a particular case (6), all the judges, except one, gave their opinions for the King, and made it a general rule in law: 1. That the laws of England are the King's laws.

2. That therefore it is an incident, inseparable prerogative of the Kings of England, as of all other sovereign Princes, to dispense with all penal laws, in particular cases, and upon particular necessary reasons. 3. That of these reasons and necessities the King is the sole Judge; consequently, 4. That this is not a trust invested in and granted to the King, but the ancient remains of the Sovereign Power of the Kings of England, which never was yet taken from them, nor can be.

The Papists openly profess their Religion.
In consequence of this decision, the Papists, with the King's permission, set up every where in the Kingdom, the free and open exercise of their Religion. The Jesuits erected Colleges and Seminaries in all the considerable towns; and at the same time, four popish Bishops were publicly consecrated in the King's Chapel, and sent down to exercise their functions in their respective Dioceses, under the title of Vicars Apostolical. Their pastoral letters addressed to the Lay-Catholics, were printed at the King's printing-house, and dispersed through the Kingdom. Monks appeared in the habits of their order at Whitehall and St. James's, and scrupled not to tell the Protestants, That they hoped in a little time, to walk in procession through Cheapside. And as many converts were expected, that so plentiful a harvest might not want labourers, a great Number of Priests and Monks were sent from foreign parts. From this time, the only way to preferment was to be a Papist, or a promoter of Popery. All affairs of the Council were managed by Catholics, or some others who had but little regard to Religion. Thus, by the decision of ten or twelve Judges, nominated and corrupted by the King before their admission, the laws of England were given up, and the constitution entirely altered. By a like practice it was, that Charles I. caused his Judges to decide, that he had a right to impose taxes in cases of necessity, of which necessity himself was sole judge. Hence it may be perceived, that the laws of England would be ill supported, had they no firmer foundation than the decisions of Judges appointed by the King. But it is surprising, that the precedent of Ship-money, established by Charles I. and in effect, the principal cause of his ruin, made so little impression on James II. But the violence of his zeal for his Religion, made every thing easy or possible to him, and, at all events, he was resolved to run the risk of the undertaking.

Places bestowed on Papists.

reign, and it ought not to seem strange, that a popish King should imitate so zealous a popish Queen. But on this occasion, the Clergy of the Church of England clearly discovered their aversion to Popery, of which they had hitherto stood accused by their enemies, on pretence of a scrupulous attachment to some modes and ceremonies, which the first Reformers had not thought fit to retrench. For many of the dignified Clergy, and the most distinguished for their piety and learning, far from prevaricating in the discharge of their office, preached openly on controverted points, or rather made them the chief subject of their discourses. They saw the tendency of this extraordinary inhibition, at a time when the Protestant Religion was openly attacked, as well in sermons, as writings printed with licence, and industriously dispersed through the nation. It is justice to do honour to these faithful Ministers of the Gospel, by transmitting to posterity the names of the most distinguished amongst them. These were Tillotson, Stillingfleet, Tennison, Wake, Patrick, Sharp, Sherlock, all famous for their writings, and all afterwards promoted to the first dignities of the Church.

The King and his popish Council were extremely offended with this boldness, and therefore, to force the Protestant Clergy to submission, the King erected a new Court for ecclesiastical affairs, composed of various members, among whom were several Catholics. A nomination of Papists to be Judges of a Protestant Clergy in matters of Doctrine and Discipline, showed that the King would no longer keep any measures. Among these commissioners were three Bishops, namely, William Sancroft of Canterbury, Crew of Durham, and Sprat of Rockingham. The rest were all Laymen, of which the principal were Jessier Lord Chancellor, the Earl of Rochester Lord-Treasurer, the Earl of Sunderland Secretary of State and President of the Council, and the Lord Chief-Justice Herbert. The Commission was directed to any three of them, whereof the Lord Chancellor was always to be one, for a reason very obvious.

By this commission they had a power to exercise and execute all manner of jurisdictions and pre-eminences, concerning any spiritual or ecclesiastical jurisdictions; to visit, reform, redress, and amend all abuses, offences, contempts, and enormities whatsoever, which by the spiritual or ecclesiastical laws of the realm might be lawfully corrected. They were also to enquire of all offences, contempts, and misdemeanours committed, or hereafter to be committed, that they might be corrected and punished by the censure of the Church; they were to search for, and call before them all ecclesiastical persons of what degree or dignity soever, and to punish the offenders, by excommunications, suspensions, deprivations, or other ecclesiastical censures: They were empowered to send for all Statutes, Rules, Letters-patents of Universities, Colleges, Grammar-Schools, and all other ecclesiastical corporations, and the said Statutes to correct, amend, and alter as they saw convenient, &c.

Many of the best Lawyers thought this commission illegal, and contrary to the Act passed in the 17th year of Charles I. for abolishing the High-Commission-Court. Others pretended, there was nothing in it contrary to that Act. It seems however, that the Court was conscious of its illegality, since though it was granted in April, it was not opened till August. Besides, the Archbishop would never act in it.

Shortly after, Dr. Sharp, in a Sermon, vindicated the Church of England in opposition to the errors of Popery. The King being informed of it, pretended, that the Preacher's intention was to beget an evil opinion of himself and his Government in the minds of the hearers, and to lead them into disobedience and rebellion. On this supposition he sent a letter to [Henry Compton] Bishop of London, commanding him forthwith to suspend Dr. Sharp from farther preaching in any Parish-church or Chapel in his Diocese, till he had given him satisfaction, and his farther pleasure was known therein. On receipt of this order, the Bishop wrote to the Earl of Sunderland, and prayed him to communicate his letter to the King. He represented, that he was to proceed according to law, and as a Judge; and by the law no Judge condemns a man before he has knowledge of the cause, and has cited the party. Dr. Sharp himself carried the letter, but could obtain no answer. Two days after, he waited on the King at Windor, with a very humble petition, but without any effect. The King 1686. and his Council had already resolved to embrace this occasion to punish the Bishop of London, who was odious to the Court, because he had moved in the House of Lords to examine the King's Speech. Besides, by so great an example, they were resolved to establish the authority of their new Ecclesiastical Court. The Bishop was therefore cited to appear before the Commissioners the 4th of August where he was treated in a manner unbecoming his birth (1) and dignity, by Jesseries the Chancellor, who used him with his wonted insolence. The Bishop demanded a copy of the commission, or at least to hear it read. But this was refused, and he was answered by Jesseries, that the commission might be had in every Coffee-House for a penny. At last, with great difficulty, he obtained a delay of five days. The 9th of August he appeared a second time before the Court, and [again on the 23d, when he] disowned its jurisdiction, alleging, that as a Bishop he had no other Judge but his Metropolitan: but his plea was rejected. At last, after two or three adjournments of the Court, he was suspended from the function and execution of his episcopal office, for his disobedience and contempt: And the Bishops of Durham, Rockyester, and Peterborough, were appointed commissioners within the Diocese of London, during the Bishop's suspension. Dr. Sharp was likewise suspended, but it was only for a few days.

This affair convinced all the world, that the Court was resolved to silence all the Protestant Ministers, to prevent their maintaining the Protestant Religion in their Sermons. It was also perceived, that the King was resolved to keep no more measures, since in a time of profound peace, he had formed a camp of fifteen thousand men upon Hounslow Heath, under the command of the Earl of Feverham. In this camp was a public chapel, where Mass was said every day.

Though the army had but very few papist officers and soldiers, it was feared, that the whole would be subservient to the King in the execution of his designs, in consequence of that blind obedience usually professed by an army. To obviate this danger, Samuel Johnson (2), addressed a writing to the Protestant officers and soldiers of the army, wherein he laid before them the reasons which ought to prevent their being the instruments of the Court, for the destruction of their Religion, and the subversion of the Government. This writing was too opposite to the King's design, to escape unpunished. Wherefore the author, being tried at the King's Bench, was sentenced to stand three times in the pillory, to be whipped from Newgate to St. Pauls, and to pay a fine of five hundred marks. The King's indignation, and degradation, was executed with great rigour. But his writing made a strong impression upon the minds of both officers and soldiers, and very much promoted the great defection which happened two years after in the army.

About the same time, the goldsmith Miles France, who had been a witness against the persons tried for the murder of Sir Edmund Godfrey, and had taken away three lives by his evidence, was tried upon an information exhibited against him for perjury, and sentenced to pay a fine of a hundred pounds, to stand three times in the pillory, and to be whipped from Newgate to Tyburn. But because he at first pleaded guilty, the whipping part of the sentence was remitted. Some say, he was so intimidated by the example of Oates, that he pleaded guilty merely to escape punishment. Others again pretend to confirm his confession from a declaration published by him afterwards, wherein he disowned his depositions in 1678. But as he was a Papist, some have suspected he was induced by religious motives to publish this declaration. In a case of this nature every man is at liberty to form his own conjectures.

It was easy to discover from the King's whole conduct, that he had entirely pulled off the mask, and was desirous to have it thought, he intended to introduce the Roman Catholic Religion. Accordingly, this was not doubted. His promise to the Council and Parliament to preserve the Protestant Religion was entirely forgot, and there was no man bold as to remind him of it. It was even dangerous to speak of it in publick conversations, for fear of some mischievous consequence. Nor was the King contented with acting openly in favour of his Religion, but even privately used all possible endeavours to make proselytes, chiefly among his courtiers, and persons of the first rank. He succeeded with respect to [Robert Spencer] Earl of Sunderland, who was willing to give him this proof of his devotion for him, though for some private reasons he refused to make a publick abjuration.

But he was not so successful in his attempt upon his brother-in-law the Earl of Rockyester. For tho' the Earl consented to be present at a conference held by Divines of both Religions (3), the dispute, it seems, only attached him more firmly to the Protestant Religion, since he bravely refused to forsake it. The King, mortified by his firmness, removed him from the Treasury, which was put in commission, but without assigning him a yearly pension of five thousand pounds upon the Post-Office. The Earl of Clarendon his elder brother felt likewise the effects of the King's displeasure upon the same account. Being recalled from his Government of Ireland before the time, he was deprived, about the end of the year, of the Privy Seal, which was given to the Lord Arundel, a Papist (4).

At last, the King gave an unquestionable proof of his zeal for the Popish Religion, by sending the Earl of Castlemain in Embassy to the Pope, To reconcile the Three Kingdoms of England, Scotland, and Ireland, to the Holy See, from which for more than an age they had fallen off by Henry. The Ambassador was received at Rome with a coldness, which gave the King a sensible mortification. Innocent XI. not suffering himself to be imposed upon by this outward show, considered that Embassy was too much precipitated, since the conversion of the three Kingdoms was yet far from being finished, and therefore he resolved to be no actor in a farce which would only render him ridiculous. And indeed to pretend to reconcile Three Kingdoms to the Church of Rome, on pretence of a few late conventions, was it not exposing the Pope, the King, and the Catholic Religion to the mirth and insults of their enemies? This Embassy was owing, it is said, to the influence of the Jesuits, who would have all Europe believe, they had converted the three Kingdoms. But Innocent XI. was not so fond of the Jesuits, as to give them this satisfaction at the expence of his own honour. Besides, being then engaged in a quarrel with France, and not ignorant of the close union between Lewis XIV. and James II. he was pleased with giving some mortification to Lewis, in the person of his friend and brother of England. To this was owing his treatment of the Ambassador with so much coldness, not to say, incivility. Whenever he granted him an audience, his Holiness had a fit of coughing at command, which spoiled the Ambassador's harangue, and obliged him to withdraw. This happened so often, that at last the Earl of Castlemain threatened to be gone. The Pope with his usual coldness sent him word, That since he would be gone, he advised him to rise early in the morning, that he might rest himself at noon; for in those countries it was dangerous to travel in the heat of the day. All the favour the Ambassador could obtain from the Pope, was a licence to the Marquis d'Humieres his daughter to marry her uncle, and a dispensation of the Statutes of the Jesuits order, that Father Petre might enjoy a Bishoprick. It is said, the Archbishoprick of York was kept vacant for him. But if the Pope and most of the Cardinals coldly received the English Ambassador, the Jesuits made him some amends by showing him all possible respect. At last, the King recalled him, being unable to bear so many mortifications.

However, the ill success of this Embassy, discouraged not the King from pursuing his design, with such ardour and openness, that it could not be mistaken. Not only all vacant preferments were conferred upon Papists, but, without any reason given, Protestants were deprived of their places to make room for Papists. So, it was easily seen, that none besides Papists, or Protestants not attached to their Religion, could pretend to any employments. The Court was so open in their measures, that some of the principal Catholics could not forbear representing to the King, that his proceedings were more dangerous than advantageous to their Religion. But the King was deaf to all but violent counsels, and such as were agreeable to his temper and zeal. One may see in the following letter, dated the 2d of February 1684, from a Jesuit of Liege to a Jesuit of Fribourg, the King's disposition with regard to Religion.

"It is wonderful to see King James's great affection to our Society: He wished prosperity to this whole College, by the Reverend Father, the Provincial, and earnestly recommended himself to our Prayers. Upon Father John Keynes's return to England, he gave him a most gracious reception, (while Earls and Dukes were commanded for some hours to wait for admittance,)

And then told them, 'He had taken much pains to bring himself to believe in God, who made the world and all in it; but it must not be an ordinary force of argument, that could make him believe, that man was quite with God, and made God again.'—Connel Kirk was also spoken to, to change his religion, but he briskly replied, 'He was pre-engaged, for he had promised the King at Mersea, that he never he changed his religion, he would turn Mahometan." 1685-7. "with whom, in the Queen's presence, he discoursed with "all familiarity. He asked him, How many Candidates "for Orders he had, and how many Students? And upon "the Provincial's answer to his Majesty, who was urgent "with him, That of the former and the latter he had
"above fifty; he replied, There would be occasion for double
"or treble that number, to effect what he designed for that "Society's performance; and ordered, that they should be "all exercised in the art of preaching: For now, says he,
"England has need of such.

"I do not doubt but you have heard, that the King
"writing to Father de la Chaise, the French King's Con"fessor, concerning the affairs of the House among the "Waltons, declared, That whatever was done to the "English Fathers of that House, he would look upon as "done to himself. Father Clare, Rector of the same "House, being arrived at London to treat of that matter, got "an easy access to the King, and as easily gained his point.
"The King himself forbade him to kneel and kiss his hand,
"according to custom, saying, Reverend Father, you have "indeed once kissed my hand; but if I had known then, as I "do now, that you were a Priest, I would rather my self,
"Father, have knelt down and kissed your hand. After "he had finished his business, in a familiar conversation,
"his Majesty told this Father, That he would either convert
"England, or die a martyr; and he had rather die the "next day and convert it, than reign twenty years piously and "happily, and not effect it. Finally, he called himself, A "SON OF THE SOCIETY, of whose good success, he "said, he was as glad as of his own. And it can scarcely "be exprest how much gratitude he shewed, when it was "told him, That he was made partaker, by the most Re- "verend our Provincial, of all the merits of the Society;
"out of which he is to nominate one for his Confessor;
"but hitherto it is not known who it will be: Some re"port, that it will be the Reverend Father the Provincial,
"but still there is no certainty of that. Many are of op"inion, that Father Edward R. Petre, who is chiefly in "favour with the King, will obtain an Archbishoprick,
"but more believe it will be a Cardinal's cap. To him
"has been granted, within this month or two, all that part "of the palace, in which the King used to reside, when "he was Duke of York, where there is not a day, but "you may see I know not how many courtiers waiting to "speak to his Eminence, for so they say he is called. For "the King advises with him, and with many Catholic "Lords, who have the chief places in the Kingdom, to "find a method to propagate the Faith without violence.
"Not long since, some of these Lords objected to the "King, That they thought he made too much haste to establish
"the Faith. To whom he answered, I am growing old,
"and must take LARGE STEPS; else if I should happen "to die, I might perhaps leave you in a worse condition than "I found you. When they asked him, Why then he was "so little concerned about the conversion of his daughters, who "were the heirs of the Kingdom? He answered, God will "take care of that; leave the conversion of my daughters to "me; do you, by your example, convert your Tenants and "others to the Faith.

"He has Catholic Lord-Lieutenants in most counties;
"and we shall have shortly Catholic Justices of the Peace "in almost all places. We hope also, that our affairs will "have good success at Oxford. In the publick Chapel of "the Vice-Chancellor, who is a Catholic, there is always
"one of our Divines, who has converted some of the stu"dents to the Faith. The Bishop of Oxford himself, "seems to be a great favourer of the Catholic Faith; he "proposed to the Council, Whether it did not seem to be "expedient, that at least one College should be granted to "the Catholics at Oxford, that they might not be forced "to study beyond sea at such great expences; but it is not "yet known what answer he had. The same Bishop "having invited two of our brethren, together with some "of the Nobility, drank the King's health to a certain
"heretick Lord who was in company, wishing his Majesty "good success in all his undertakings: Adding also, That the "Religion of the Protestants in England, did not seem to "him in a better condition, than Buda was before it was "taken; and that they were next to Absinth, that defended "that Faith. Many embrace the true Religion, and four "of the most considerable Earls had lately made publick "profession of it. Father Alexander Keynes, the Provinci"al's nephew, to whom is committed the care of the "Chapel belonging to the Elector Palatine's Envoy, is "continually taken up in solving and answering the ques"tions of heretics, who doubt of their Faith, of whom "you may see two or three together walking by the Chapel
"door, continually disputing about some point of Religion.
"As to Prince George, it is yet uncertain what Religion
"he professes. We gradually begin to get footing in Eng"land; we teach human learning at Lincoln, Norwich,
"and York; and at Worcester we have a publick Chapel,
"No. 81. VOL. II.

"protected by a guard of the King's soldiers; and we are "to buy some houses at Ifigan in Lancashire. The Ca-"tholick interest grows very strong; and at some "Churches, granted to the Catholics, upon Holidays,
"there are often counted fifteen hundred present at the "Sermon. At London also, our business is carried on with "the same good success: Sermons are preached upon every "Holiday, and there are so many that frequent the Cha"pels, that they are not big enough to hold them. Two "of our Society, Dormer and Bertue, preach continually
"before the King and the Queen; Father Edward Neville,
"before the Queen-Dowager; Father Alexander Keynes,
"in the Chapel aforesaid; others in other Chapels. There "are many houses bought in the Savoy, near Somerset-"house, which is the Queen-Dowager's palace, towards "erecting the first College in London, for about eighteen "thousand Florins; and they are hard at work to bring "them to the form of a College, that a School may be "opened before Easter.

"A Catholic Lord-Lieutenant is shortly to go over "to Ireland, because the King cannot be satisfied with "any other, to establish the Catholic interest in that "Kingdom. The Parliament will certainly sit in this "month of February, of whom his Majesty is resolved to "ask three things: First, That by a general Act all the "Catholic Peers may be admitted to sit in the Upper-"house: Secondly, That the Test may be abolished:
"And thirdly, which is the chief point, That all penal "laws against Catholics should be abrogated. And that "he may the better obtain these things, he designs to let "them all know, That he is resolved to turn out all those "who will not heartily assent for the obtaining of them; and "likewise dissolve the Parliament. At which resolution
"some hereticks being terrified, came to a certain Earl to "advise with him what might be done; to whom he an"swered, The King's mind is sufficiently known; what he "has once said he will certainly perform: If you love your "selves submit to the King's pleasure. There is to be a "great preparation of war at London, and a fleet of above
"a hundred men of war, is to be fitted out against the "spring, but against whom it is uncertain. The Dutch "are under great apprehensions, but for what reason, al"though they are said to make an armament, time will "best discover."

The Jesuits of Fribourg made no scruple to shew this "letter to several persons, who taking copies of it, made it
"publick in Switzerland, and at Geneva. Dr. Burnet says, T. I. p. 712.
"he copied it from one in the hands of Monsieur Heidegger,
"a famous Professor at Zurich. One of the copies was sent "to Monsieur Dickvelt, Ambassador of the States-General in "England, who spoke of it to the King. Whereupon the "King desired to see it, saying, he should soon know whe"ther it was genuine, or forged, to render the Jesuits odious.
"But though it was put into his hands, he spoke no more of "it to Monsieur Dickvelt.

The Parliament, which, according to the last proroga-
"tion, was to meet the 15th of February, was farther proro"gued [to the 28th of April.] Probably, the King found "not things ripe enough, as he desired, to be assured of the "concurrence of the Parliament in the execution of his de"signs. He chose rather to take another course, which to "him seemed more short and easy, in establishing liberty of "Conscience by his own authority. He was, doubtless, per"suaded, that it would be more easy to obtain the consent "of the Parliament to a thing already done, than the power "to do it. But he thought proper to begin with Scotland, "that the example of that Kingdom might influence the Eng"lish. For this purpose, he sent a proclamation into Scotland "for an entire liberty of Conscience, with orders to the "Privy-Council to publish it. In his opinion, this proclama"tion was more than capable to convince all his good sub"jects of his great moderation, and desire that all should "live in quiet. He excluded, however, out of his favour,
"the Field-Conventioners, whom he recommended to his "Council to prosecute with all the severity of the laws.
"This proclamation contained in substance:
"That his Majesty being resolved to unite the hearts
"and affections of his subjects, to God in Religion, to him
"in loyalty, and to their neighbours in Christian love and "charity; he had therefore thought fit, by his Sovereign "Authority, Prerogative Royal, and Absolute Power, to "which all his subjects were to obey without RESERVE, N. 222.
"to give and grant his royal Toleration, to the several "professors of the Christian Religion after named. First,
"He allows and tolerates the moderate Presbyterians, to "meet in their private houses only; but it is his pleasure "that Field Conventioners be prosecuted according to the "utmost severity of the laws. In like manner, he toler-"ates Quakers to meet and exercise in their form, in any "place or places appointed for their worship." Then the "proclamation proceeds thus, "Considering the severe and "cruel laws made against Roman Catholics, (therein
"called

1686-7. "called Papists) in the minority of our royal Grandfather of glorious memory, without his consent, and contrary to the duty of good subjects, by his regents and other enemies to their lawful Sovereign, our great-grand-mother Queen Mary, of blessed and pious memory; wherein, under the pretence of Religion, they clothed the worst of treasons, factions, and usurpations; and made these laws, not against the enemies of God, but their own: Which laws have still been continued of course, without design of executing them, or any of them, ad terrorem only, on supposition, that the Papists, relying on an external power, were incapable of duty and true allegiance to their natural Sovereigns, and rightful Monarchs: We of our certain knowledge and long experience, knowing that the Catholics, as it is their principle to be good Christians, so it is to be dutiful subjects; and that they have likewise, on all occasions, shewn themselves good and faithful Subjects to us, and our royal predecessors, &c. Do therefore, with the consent of our Privy-Council, by our Sovereign Authority, Prerogative Royal, and Absolute Power, suspend, stop, and disable all laws or acts of Parliament, made or executed against any of our Roman Catholic Subjects, in any time past, to all intents and purposes, making void all prohibitions therein mentioned, pains or penalties therein ordained to be inflicted: So that they shall in all things be as free in all respects, as any of our Protestant subjects whatsoever, not only to exercise their Religion, but to enjoy all offices, benefices, and others, which we shall think fit to bestow upon them in all time coming. — And whereas the obedience of our subjects is due to us by their allegiance, and our Sovereignty; and that no law, difference in Religion, or other impediment whatsoever, can exempt the subjects from their native obligations to the Crown; and considering, that some oaths are capable of being wrested by men of sinister intentions, a practice in that Kingdom as fatal to Religion as Loyalty: We therefore call, annul, and discharge all oaths whatsoever, by which any of our subjects are incapacitated from holding places or offices in our said Kingdom, discharging the same to be taken or given in any time coming, without our special warrant and consent; and we do stop, disable, and dispend with all laws, injoining the said oaths, tests, or any of them, &c." Towards the conclusion, the King reiterates former promises in these words: — "For the encouragement of our Protestant Bishops, and the regular Clergy, and such as have hitherto lived orderly, we think fit to declare, that it never was our principle, nor will we ever suffer violence to be offered to any man's conscience, nor will we use force, or invincible necessity, against any man on the account of his perdition, nor the Protestant Religion; but will protect our Bishops and other Ministers, in their functions, rights, and properties, and all our Protestant subjects, in the free exercise of their Protestant Religion in the Churches."

Though this proclamation concerned only Scotland, I thought proper to insert it here, because it discovers clearly the King's intentions and principles, and consequently, how he pretended to deal with his English subjects, though hitherto he still kept within some bounds, with regard to that absolute power, which England had not ascribed to him in so extensive a manner as Scotland.

The Council of Scotland blindly obeyed the King, not only by publishing his proclamation, but even by thanking him for it, as for a signal favour. This ought not to appear strange, because the Council wholly consisted of men entirely devoted to the King, nor was there in Scotland any person in a public office, who was not, or at least pretended not, to be in the same principles. The Parliament was composed in the same manner, and by Acts passed, had obliged all the Scots to an unlimited obedience, so that no man could oppose the King's measures, under pain of High-treason. Accordingly, the Council, in thanking the King for his proclamation, might boldly speak for the whole Kingdom: Not that they were ignorant that it was not the general sentiment of the nation, but because they knew, no person would have the boldness to contradict it. It is not therefore to the whole Scotch nation, that this blind obedience is to be imputed, but to their Governors, who were but a small part of the people.

The King charmed with the ready compliance of the Scots, and considering it as a favorable precedent for England, summoned his Council, and told them, "it was his intention to publish the like Declaration in England." He grounded his resolution on his observing, that the endeavours to establish a uniformity in the four preceding reigns, had proved ineffectual, and been very prejudicial to the nation. That besides, it was his opinion, as most suitable to the principles of Christianity, "That no man should be persecuted for Conscience-sake; for he thought conscience could not be forced." The Council composed like that of Scotland, approved of this resolution, and manifested extremely the King's indulgence to his Subjects. The Declaration for Liberty of Conscience was therefore published the 4th of April. It was much the same with that published in Scotland, except that the King softened his expressions concerning the King's absolute power, and said, he made no doubt of the concurrence of his two Houses of Parliament, when he should think it convenient for them to meet. It was however manifest, from the frequent provocations of this Parliament, that he was far from being assured of their concurrence.

Very probably, there was not in the whole nation a single person, who thought the King designed to favour or ease the Nonconformists. Every one clearly saw, that his aim in this declaration was to establish the popish Religion, upon the ruins of the Protestant. For how could it be supposed, that the King, from a violent persecutor, should at once become a friend to the Dissenters? Or what assurance could there be, that his promises to the Nonconformists, would be better kept than those he had made to the Church of England? Nevertheless the Nonconformists had hitherto been treated with so much rigour, that it is not strange, they should at first think themselves happy in a deliverance from persecution. For this reason, addresses of thanks, from the several Sects, were presented to the King for his declaration. The Anabaptists led the way: The Quakers followed, and next came the Independents; and lastly, the Presbyterians. Some of these addresses speaking of the Royal Power, carried it to the highest degree, because it was then advantageous to the Nonconformists to maintain the authority by which they were freed from their constraint. The Churchmen failed not to take notice of this change. But they could not justly blame an excess into which themselves had fallen. The truth is, the two parties neither did then, nor yet do, follow on all occasions, their own principles, with relation to the Royal Power, which they extend or contract, as the King is more or less favorable to them.

Be this as it will, the war then waged between the two parties was of no long continuance. They were quickly sensible, that the Court aimed to revive their former animosities, in order to weaken them both. The King, to succeed in this design, made the hardships and persecutions which the Nonconformists had suffered from the Church of England, the topic of his discourse in his common conversations. No greater pleasure could be done him, than to entertain him with the particulars of those oppressions. To give the Church of England a still more sensible mortification, he ordered the proxies in the ecclesiastical Court against the Dissenters to be revived. But the Presbyterians, who were most concerned, were so wise as not to improve for favorable an occasion to mortify their enemies. On the other hand, though some passionate men amongst the Dissenters, published virulent invectives against the Church, to retaliate their ill usage, the Episcopalian unanimously resolved not to answer them, for fear of widening the breach between the two parties, at a time when their union was more than ever necessary. It cannot be denied, that herein their moderation and prudence were exemplary. In general, it may be affirmed, that if some of the Nonconformists, whether Presbyterians or others, suffered themselves to be transported by their passion into insults upon the Church of England, they were men of no note. The most sensible, and those who had most credit in their party, observed a great moderation. The Episcopalian on their side, did all that lay in their power to establish union, solely capable of supporting them both. Writings were published from time to time, in which the Churchmen acknowledged their error in driving the Presbyterians to extremities; that they were not sufficiently aware of the artifices of the Court, and promised to have for them great condescension, in case affairs were restored upon a good foot. It is true, they are accused of having been no less forgetful of this promise, than of that made when the Restoration of Charles II. was transacting. But this concerns the following reigns.

If there were Nonconformists who thought themselves obliged to express their gratitude for the King's declaration, by flattering addresses, there were likewise Bishops who, with much less foundation, prevailed with their Clergy to send addresses of thanks to the King, as for a signal favour to the Church of England. Of this number were Cresswell Bishop of Durham, Barlow of Lincoln, Gartwright of Chester, Wood of Lichfield, Weldon of St. David's. As for Parker Bishop of Oxford he was not so successful, since he could find but one Clergyman in his whole Diocese, who would sign such an address. It may easily be imagined, that, had the King's project succeeded, these Bishops would not have been the last to embrace the popish Religion.

The steps already made by the King for the interest of the popish Religion, were not thought sufficient by those who aspired to greater advantages. Hitherto the Papists had not been able to procure any preferments in either of the Universities, Kings.

1687. Universities, and yet they were passionately desirous to set up these Masters and Professors of their own Religion, in order to become in time matters of some of the Colleges. It had been proposed to the King to found a College in each University. But, whether the expence discouraged him; or whatever was the reason, it was thought more proper to introduce Papists into the Colleges already founded. The design was begun at Cambridge, where [Dr. John Peachell] the Vice-Chancellor received a letter from the King, commanding the University to admit to the degree of Master of Arts, Alban Francis, a Benedictine Monk, without administering any oath whatsoever, notwithstanding any Statute or Law to the contrary, which the King was pleased to dispense with in favour of the said Alban Francis. The Vice-Chancellor having communicated this letter to the congregation of Regents and Non-Regents, it was unanimously agreed by the members, not to admit the said Francis, till the King had been petitioned to revoke the mandate. For this purpose, they applied to [Christopher Monk] Duke of Albemarle, their Chancellor, praying his intercession with the King, to which he returned for answer, That he had tried but to no effect. Upon this answer the University sent deputies to London, who were to apply to the Earl of Sunderland, but he refused to hear them. Shortly after the King sent a second letter to the University, the same in substance with the former, with this addition, To do it at their peril. As the University continued still to stand their ground, a summons was sent from the new Ecclesiastical Commissioners, commanding the Vice-Chancellor to appear in person before them and the Congregation, by themselves, or their deputies. In short, by sentence of the Court, the Vice-Chancellor was deprived of his office; but Francis was not admitted. This was the first avowed attempt to introduce Papists into the University. I say avowed, for some might have been received under the pretence of being Protestants. But soon after Magdalen College in Oxford, the richest in revenue (1), had a more terrible storm to encounter.

The Presidency of that College being vacant the 31st of March, by the death of Dr. Clark, the Vice-President gave notice for a new election the 15th of April. But before that day, the members of the College were informed, that the King had granted a particular mandate in favour of Mr. Anthony Farmer, a man of ill reputation, who had promised to declare himself a Papist. Whereupon they presented a petition to the King, praying him, either to leave them to the choice of their President, according to their Founder's Statutes, or to recommend a person who might be more serviceable to his Majesty, and the College. The answer received from the Earl of Sunderland, was, That the King must be obeyed. Immediately after, the King's mandate was delivered to Mr. Robert Charnock (2), a new convert and Fellow of the College. This mandate being read in the presence of all the Fellows, it was resolved to keep to the day appointed for the election (3), on which day Dr. Hough was chosen by a great majority. The new President was presented to the Visitor, the Bishop of Winchester, who swore and admitted him to his office.

The King was extremely provoked with this election, and notwithstanding the interposition of the Duke of Ormond Chancellor of the University, the Vice-President and Fellows were cited to appear before the Ecclesiastical Commissioners at Whitehall. Accordingly, the 6th of June, six Fellows deputed by the Society, appeared before the Commissioners, and to the question, Why they refused to obey the King's Mandate? they produced their Statutes, and the oath they had taken for the observation of them, by which Statutes Farmer could have no pretension. They were ordered to attend again the 22d of the month, on which day they gave in so many allegations against Farmer, (who besides was unqualified by the Statutes,) that the Commissioners were ashamed of him. But as it was the King's cause, they were maintaining, they deprived Dr. Hough of his Presidency, and suspended the Vice-President, and one of the Fellows (4). The King being informed of the allegations against Farmer, thought fit to drop his first mandate, and granted a second in favour of Dr. Parker Bishop of Oxford.

The Fellows of the College finding him no better qualified than Farmer, refused to obey the new mandate. This so incensed the King, that he went himself to Oxford, bent at all hazards to overcome their obstinacy. He ordered them to attend him at Christ Church, and spoke to them in terms capable of intimidating men of less firmness and resolution. He commanded them to be gone, and to admit the Bishop of Oxford their President, letting them know, that otherwise they should feel the weight of his hand. But instead of obeying, they offered a petition in vindication of their proceedings; but the King would not receive it. At last, after all his menaces, he was forced to leave Oxford, without gaining his point. Shortly after, the King appointed a Commission to visit the College, namely, Cecilwright Bishop of Chesham, Sir Robert Wright Chief Justice of the King's Bench, and Sir Thomas Jenner a Baron of the Exchequer. These Commissioners treated the Fellows very uncivilly; abstaining not even from frivolous and abusive language. At last, seeing it was not possible to overcome them; they found an expedient to save in some measure the King's honour, by an ambiguous Declaration, to which the Fellows were willing to submit. But this satisfied not the King, who, the Commissioners said, expected some farther submission, which they advised them to make, "by acknowledging their contempt to his sacred Majesty in person, and to his letters; that they should promise to behave themselves loyally for the future; that they should own the proceedings and legality of the Court, implore his Majesty's pardon, and lay themselves at his feet; and that they should declare their entire submission to the Bishop of Oxford as their President." Of twenty-seven Fellows, only Charnock and another (5) offered to sign this submission. At last, the commissioners, empowered by the King, deprived the twenty-five, who refused to subscribe the declaration, of their Fellowships, and expelled them from the College, for disobedience to the King's commands. They all protested against the sentence, declaring, They would use all just and legal ways of being relieved. The sentence however was confirmed by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and aggravated, by declaring the President and Fellows incapable of being admitted to any ecclesiastical dignity or benefice. The President refused to put the Bishop of Oxford in possession of his lodgings, which were therefore broke open. All the College was filled with Papists, and Charnock was made Vice-President. Though this affair held from the beginning of June, to the end of October, I was willing, in order to avoid repetition, to finish the narrative at once.

The King discovered on all occasions his extraordinary zeal for the advancement of his Religion; but principally in the disposal of all places and offices in his gift. For some time, he had scarce preferred any, but those who were willing to purchase his favour by changing their Religion, and often displaced those who testified a zeal for the Protestant Religion, without regard to past services or offences. Many of those who had been most active for the Bill of Exclusion were careful and courted, provided they would embrace the King's Religion, as for instance, the Earl of Sunderland. But an adherence to the Protestant Religion, was a sufficient cause to remove those who had done him the most important services on the same occasion, witness his brothers-in-law the Earls of Clarendon and Reichart. [Charles Talbot] Earl of Shrewsbury, who some years before had turned Protestant, lost his regiment of Horse, for refusing to return to Popery. The Lords-Lieutenants of Counties were almost all Papists. As for the Judges, some were Papists, and the rest, though Protestants, were ready to obey all the King's commands. If any of them proved too scrupulous, they were immediately displaced, for others more compliant. These mercenary Judges, when they went their circuits, received orders from the Chancellor, to use all their authority for confirming the Right assumed by the King of dispensing with the Laws, and to discourage, as much as possible, those whom they should not find disposed to submission. These orders were executed with extreme rigour and insolence.

Every one plainly saw the tendency of these proceedings, for the King was open and undisguised. Nevertheless, there were even among the Lawyers themselves, some that affected to approve of all his actions, and by their addresses, to encourage him to proceed. To shew the excessive flattery of these men, I shall here insert an address presented to the King the 11th of June, by the society of the Middle Temple.

May it please your Majesty,

WE your Majesty's dutiful Subjects, to our great joy, have received a happy occasion of making this Declaration of our gratitude: And as we know that your Majesty's goodness is the greatest that ever was shewn by a Prince to his Subjects, so we with the voice of men and angels, to return sufficient thanks for your Majesty's condescension and clemency to all your Subjects, in your gracious Declaration for a Toleration.

"And as for this compassion and goodness, thanks ought to be paid your Majesty by all his Subjects; so we especially of the profession of the Law, have most reason to be thankful for the honour you have done us, by asserting your own Royal Prerogatives, which is the very life of the law, and our profession. A Libel against the King.

With all this, the King was disappointed in an affair which he earnestly laboured, and that was the gaining the Parliament to approve of the power pretended to by him of dispensing with the laws. The Parliament should have met the 28th of April, and it was expected accordingly. But the King, not finding things so ripe as he desired, had prorogued it to the 22d of November. Some days before this prorogation a Pamphlet had been dispersed in London, tending to give the Parliament a disadvantageous idea of the King, in the supposition that they were going to sit. Here is a short extract of this pamphlet, which was ascribed to Dr. Burnet, then in Holland.

"Our King has given such testimonies of his zeal for his Religion, that we see among all his other royal Qualities, there is none for which he desires and deserves to be so much admired, since even the passion of Glory, of making himself the terror of all Europe, and arbiter of Christendom, (which as it is natural to all Princes, so must it be most particularly so to one of his martial and noble temper) yields to his zeal for his Church; and that he, in whom we might have hoped to see our Edward the third, our Henry the fifth revived, chafes rather to merit the heightning his degree of glory in another world, than to acquire all the conquests that this low and vile world can give him: And that, instead of making himself a terror to his neighbours, he is contented with the humble glory of being a terror to his own people; so that instead of the great figure this reign might make in the world, all the news of England, is now only concerning the practices on some fearful Mercenaries."

Yet Members of the last Parliament winded from an ac-casion.

In the mean time, the King continued to take infinite pains to gain the members of Parliament. He closetted, one by one, all that were in London, and represented to them what he thought capable to convince them of the necessity to abolish the Penal laws, for the good of the Kingdom, and enforced his arguments with menaces and promises. It is not improbable, but some might be gained, but he could never be assured of a majority of voices. This determined him at last to dissolve the Parliament, by proclamation the 2d of July.

When the firmness of the members of this Parliament, as soon as they believed the interests of Religion were at stake, is compared with their extreme zeal for the King in the beginning of their session, it must be inferred, that their compliance was owing purely to their mistake in their good opinion of the King, and that their firmness proceeded from their being at last undeceived. They are therefore unjustly accused, of intending to sacrifice to the King, the interest of Religion and their Country. They demonstrated the contrary, in refusing the temptations, the King laid before them, even in his presence, and face to face. This, in my opinion, is the highest degree to which firmness can be carried. They were all, or almost all, members of the Church of England; nay, for the most part, High Churchmen. I have before given the reason of their excessive zeal and condescension for the King, and therefore need not repeat it. But when they discovered that the point was not to curb the Dissenters, but that the King's designs concerned the Protestant Religion, without any distinction of sects, they evidently showed, that they were as good Protestants, as those who accused them of being Papists, or popishly inclined. This truth will still more plainly appear, in the firm and unshaken courage of the Church of England, on the most important occasion that ever was.

After the Parliament was dissolved, the King's grand affair was to have a new one entirely at his devotion. But he would not call one, till he was assured of having such members returned, as he should think proper. For this purpose, Quo Warrants were issued against several Corporations, to the end, that when they were deprived of their Charters, the King might grant such new ones, as should render him master of the Elections. It may be imagined, that as the Courts of Justice were dissolved, the Corporations could not but be deprived of their Charters, and for obtaining new ones, were obliged to comply with the King's desires. This was one of the methods used by the King, to dispose the People to elect such members, as would promote the design of taking off the penal Law and Test. It would be too tedious and difficult to relate all the King's secret methods, the emissaries he sent into the Counties and Corporations, the instructions he gave them to gain the People, the arguments, promises, and menaces, they used. All that can be said in general, is, that nothing was forgot which he thought would contribute to the procuring a favorable Parliament. To this end, Magistrates and Lord-Lieutenants were displaced, but chiefly, particular men were closetted to engage them in the King's measures. It was also with this view that he made a progress through several Counties, and stopped at the cities and great towns, to caress or intimidate the People. But he every where met with such coldness, or rather aversion to his designs, that he durst not venture to call a Parliament. As the people were convinced, that the King's design, with whatever pretence he disguised it, was to deprive them of their liberty, and change the established Religion, they would not be the instruments of their own ruin. The affair of Magdalen College, which was in its greatest heat, during the King's progress, greatly contributed to open the eyes of the most blind, and exasperate the nation. The King would have a Parliament, which should consent to the abrogation of the penal Laws and Test, or grant him a power of dispensing with them, at a time when his whole conduct discovered a settled design of planting the Popish, upon the ruin of the Protestant Religion. Besides, it was manifest, he did not ask this power as a favour, but insisted upon it as a right, which he had already assumed, without the concurrence of the Parliament.

At last, the King showed so open a contempt of the Law, that no person could mistake him. After sending, as we have seen, a solemn Embassy to Rome, he would have a Nuntio in ordinary residing at his own Court. The Pope had, the last year, nominated for this employment, Ferdinando Dadda, domestic Prelate to his Holiness, who had been about the King ever since his accession to the Crown, and was the Queen's great favorite. He had been received as Nuntio, but privately, and without the people's knowledge. But now the King having entirely pulled off the mask, was for honoring him with a public reception, though to assume the character of the Pope's Nuntio was high-treason. To give more lustre to the Nuntio, he was first consecrated Archbishop of Amasia in the Royal Chapel, after which, on the 3d of July, he made his public entry at Windsor, with great pomp and magnificence. It was a very surprising spectacle to Protestants, to see a Nuntio from the Pope in his Pontificalibus, preceded by a Cross-bearer, and a train of Priests and Monks, in the habits of their respective orders. Mean while, on this very occasion the King received an unexpected mortification; for having ordered [Charles Seymour] Duke of Somerset to attend the Nuntio to his audience, he desired his Majesty to excuse him from an office which the laws of the land made criminal. This so incensed the King, that he removed him from his Places of Gentleman of the Bed-chamber, and Colonel of the Dragoons. [Henry Fitz-roy] Duke of Grafton, less scrupulous, accepted the office refused by the Duke of Somerset. Some have believed, that Dadda was one of the King's principal Counsellors in affairs of Religion. But it is not likely, he would act so contrary to the sentiments of the Pope, who by no means approved the King's conduct. The same thing cannot be said of Father Petre, or Peters, the King's Confessor, who was the first mover of all the engines to advance the progress of Popery. He was publicly received into the Council the 11th of November, contrary to the opinion of the most eminent Papists, who justly feared the King's affairs would thereby be very much prejudiced.

Though the King had given convincing proofs of his aversion to the Protestant Religion, he favourably received the French Protestants, who took sanctuary in England, and on account of the rigours exercised against them in France. He not only granted them his protection, but also large sums, besides his licence to encourage a public collection. Some ascribe this to policy, in order to intinate to the English, how little ground they had to fear such treatment in England, from the King, who was so charitably compassionate to the misfortunes of foreigners, persecuted in their own country. But as the King himself did not discover the motives of this conduct, they can only be conjectured. Thus much is certain, the French Ministers thought them-

1687. selves under such obligations to the King, that they were amongst the most forward to display his virtues in their Sermons, whenever an occasion offered. I myself remember to have heard a Preacher in the Church of the Savoy launch out into the profane flattery (1).

[George Villiers] Duke of Buckingham, who now made a contemptible figure, died this year in Yorkshire, just as he had lived, that is, without any sense of Religion. This same year death likewise seized the famous Sir William Petty, Physician and Fellow of the Royal Society, after having published several useful and valuable writings.

I am now come to the year 1688, a critical year to England, the first half of which pertended to the English the loss of their Religion and Liberties. James II. had promoted his great work in the three years he had been on the throne, with a surprising rapidity and success. He had invested himself with an absolute power, that hardly suffered any contradiction. The laws of the land were openly violated. The Privy-Council was almost wholly popish, and under the direction of a Jesuit. The most considerable places in the Court and Kingdom were possessed by men of the same Religion. The Test and Penal Laws were insufficient fences to secure Religion, for which they were intended. In a word, the King was resolved to complete his work at all events, and an army of fifteen thousand men, encamped within a few miles of London, besides the assistance of France, seemed to promise him success. But what was more extraordinary, was, that Protestant Corporations, when their Religion was so violently attacked, sent their addresses of thanks to the King, as for a great favour, publicly promising to chuse such members for the ensuing Parliament, as should concur with his measures. All this gave just occasion to fear, that no remedy could possibly be found for the miseries of the nation, which daily increased. The only refuge which seemed to be left, was the Princess of Orange, presumptive heir of the Crown, who, like another Elizabeth, would restore things to their former State, when she should ascend the throne. But, besides that the King, who was but in his fifty-fifth year, might yet live a great while, an astonishing Proclamation, published the 2d of January, to notify the Queen's being with child, and to order publick Thanksgiving to God, entirely destroyed the hopes which had been entertained. The Papists were transported with this agreeable news.

The Queen with Child. Gazette N. 259. Kennet, p. 496. Echard, III. p. 843.

Self-doubt therefore.

Kennet, p. 497. Echard, III. p. 843.

A Miracle pretended.

Some even began to debate the question, whether a daughter born since the King's advancement to the throne, ought not to take place before the Princess of Orange, born while he was Duke of York? But this question was very needless. Every one was persuaded, the Papists through hope, and the Protestants through fear, that the Queen would be delivered of a Prince. It is very certain, the Protestants from this time began to form suspicions about the Queen's pregnancy. This appeared in several pamphlets, dispersed through London, some of which were even dropped in Whitehall. Hitherto, the sole foundation of the suspicion; that the Queen's pregnancy was a cheat, consisted in her having been so many years childless. But this foundation was too weak to prove the certainty of an imposture. It was not impossible for the Queen to be with child; but on the other hand, neither was it impossible that the Queen should be willing to suppose an heir. The extreme zeal of the King and Queen, and of most of their counsellors and confidants, for their Religion, rendered such a suspicion plausible to the Protestants. Histories have recorded instances of the like impostures, as in Spain, and in England itself, where it is pretended, that Queen Mary, to deprive her Sister Elizabeth of the Succession, would have supposed an heir, had not her husband King Philip prevented it. For this reason, the story of Queen Mary's sham-conception, as delivered by Fox, was reprinted and dispersed thro' the Kingdom, with this title, Idem iterum, or Queen Mary's Big-Belly. Another cause which contributed greatly to corroborate this suspicion, was the indifference of some Jesuits, who published, that she would certainly be delivered of a Prince. They pretended, that this conception was miraculous, and the effect of a solemn petition, which the late deceased Duchess of Modena had put up in heaven to the blessed Virgin Mary, or of a vow the Queen had made to our Lady of Loretto, with the present of a golden image, enriched with precious stones. As on pretence that the Queen had been several years childless, her pregnancy could not be deemed supernatural, there was no necessity to ascribe it to a miracle, of which there could be no certainty. So, this needless precaution served only to confirm the suspicion.

The Queen's pregnancy produced many congratulatory addresses. Some of these carried their compliments and flattery to the last excess. This is no wonder. Most of the Lords-Lieutenants, Justices, and Magistrates of the towns, being devoted to the King, it was not difficult for them to persuade the Corporations, that their congratulations to the King were the just tribute of their duty. This being once inculcated, they drew up the address themselves; and procured such subscriptions as they thought proper, thereby causing the Corporations to say what they pleased. Were addresses to be considered, as containing the real sentiments of the people, it might be said; that all the English nation was transported with joy, through the hopes of a popish Successor. But the nation soon discovered directly opposite sentiments. Besides, it appears, the King did not rely on this general concurrence of his Subjects, since he dur'd not to call a Parliament, whose approbation and compliance were the great object of his desires.

Besides the forementioned methods, which the King used to advance the popish Religion, there was still another from which he promised himself great success. Sometime since, the Romish Priests and Jesuits had printed and dispersed a great number of Controversial Writings, which had been answered by Tillotson, Tennison, Stillingfleet, Sherlock, and others, in a manner which, in all appearance, was not agreeable to the Papists. The King, without doubt, that his Doctors would not be a match for the champions of the Church of England, published a Proclamation, grounded upon a Statute made the 14th of Charles II., "prohibiting the printing and selling all unlicensed and traitorous books and pamphlets, under the pains and penalties provided by the said Act." Under this name were comprehended the Controversial Books published by the Protestants, on a pretence, that they encouraged and fomented animosities amongst his Subjects (2).

The King's grand design, as hath been seen, was to repeal the Test and Penal Laws, and for that purpose he wished to have a Parliament at his devotion. He had already abrogated these Laws by his own authority, but he daily found, that this did not suffice to lead his Subjects to the degree of compliance he desired. He thought therefore, if the consent of the Prince and Princess of Orange could be obtained, it would be a great step towards obtaining the same thing of the Parliament. To that end, he resolved to sound the inclinations of the Prince of Orange, without his appearing in it. He employed Mr. James Stewart (3), Penionary Fagel's acquaintance, who writ to that Minister, endeavouring to persuade him, that it was the interest of England, and of the Prince and Princess of Orange, that the Test should be abrogated, and the Laws against the Catholics repealed. This letter coming only from a private man, the Prince would not allow Mr. Fagel to return an answer. Mr. Stewart in vain renewed his instances for an answer, till at last, he was obliged to acquaint Mr. Fagel, that his first letter was writ by the King's direction, who desired to have the opinion of the Prince and Princess upon the affair. This, joined to the false report propagated in London, that the Prince and Princess of Orange had given their consent to the abrogation of the Test and Penal Laws, forced Mr. Fagel at last to answer Mr. Stewart, and let him know the sentiments of the Prince and Princess of Orange.

The letters of these Gentlemen have made so much noise in the world, and are so universally known, that I do not think it necessary to insert them. I shall content myself with briefly refreshing the Reader's memory with the substance of Mr. Fagel's answer. He told Mr. Stewart, "That it was the opinion of the Prince and Princess, that no Christian ought to be punished for his Conscience, or ill used because he differed from the established Religion; and therefore could consent, that the Roman Catholics should enjoy a full Liberty of Conscience. That as to the Nonconformists, their Highnesses did not only consent, but heartily approved of their having an entire Liberty of Conscience, for the exercise of their Religion, without any trouble, hindrance, or molestation on that score. — But their High Mightinesses could not by any means agree to the repeal of the Test, and those other Penal Laws, that tended to the security of the Protestant Religion, since the Roman Catholics received no other prejudice from these, than their being excluded from Parliament and publick employments; and that by them the Protestant Religion is sheltered from all the designs of the Roman Catholics against it, or against the publick safety."

This answer was supported with reasons so clear and solid, that Mr. Stewart finding himself too weak for such 1688. an adversary, thought it more advisable to deny all correspondence with Mr. Fagel on this subject, in order to destroy the authority of Mr. Fagel's answer, which had been printed and dispersed through England and all Europe. The Penitentiary provoked at this proceeding, sent a letter to the Marquis of Albany, the English Ambassador at the Hague, wherein he called him to witness, that the Prince and Princess of Orange had declared their thoughts to him concerning the penal Laws, in the same manner as he had represented them; and that Albany had acquainted the King with it long before he wrote his letter. He complained of the Earl of Sunderland, for having assigned an Allowance to print a pamphlet (1), which asserted, that the answer of Mr. Fagel to Mr. Stewart was supposititious, though he himself had seen the original, and knew that the King had also seen it. This last letter was likewise printed in French and English, and dispersed. All this was extremely injurious to the King, and began to give the English hopes, that the Prince and Princess of Orange would not abandon them in their pressing necessities. It must be observed, that Mr. Fagel's letter to Mr. Stewart was writ on November the 4th, the last year, before the Queen's pregnancy was divulged. But this affair became not publick, till the beginning of the year 1688.

A second Declaration for Liberty of Conscience.

The refusal of the Prince and Princess of Orange to consent to the abrogation of the Test and penal Laws, served only to inflame the King's zeal, and oblige him to use fresh endeavours to have a Parliament at his devotion. He sent therefore emissaries into the several counties, to try to secure the elections, before he ventured to call a Parliament. But the more solicitous he was to gain this point, the less inclination he found in the people, who, on so important an occasion, were unwilling to trust their interests with men devoted to the Court, as the King desired. Wherefore the King, foreseeing all his artifices would prove unsuccessful, and that he should at last be obliged to use force, gave out commissions for raising new troops, for the increasing of his standing army; and likewise caused a larger fleet to be equipped. The new commissions were almost all given to Irish and Popish officers. Moreover, he wrote, the 17th of January, to the States-General, to demand the six English and Scotch regiments that were in their service. The 2d of March he issued out a proclamation, "Forbidding his natural born subjects to enter or lift themselves in the service of any foreign Prince or State, either by sea or land."

The States did not think proper to send these regiments to the King in the present juncture. They returned a civil answer, and declared, That having examined their engagements, they could find no agreement or capitulation that could oblige them to grant his Majesty's demands, except when he was in war with some of his neighbours, or there was an insurrection at home. That they had accordingly sent the six regiments into England in the year 1685, at the time of the Duke of Monmouth's rebellion. But that now the King being in peace with his neighbours, and free from disturbances at home, they saw no reason that could oblige them to send back those troops. The King not satisfied with this answer, renewed his instances. But the States, in shewing how these regiments were formed, and the treaties which had been made about them, insisted, that they were obliged to send them back only in the two cases above-mentioned, and that the King was not at present in either. At last, after a third fruitless attempt, the King, by a proclamation, called home all his subjects which were in the service of the States-General. Whereupon, the Prince of Orange offered passes to all the officers of the six regiments that were willing to return home, which about forty of them accepted.

Though the King had published last year a declaration, for an entire liberty of Conscience to all his subjects, and, by virtue thereof, had filled almost all the offices with Catholics, he thought fit to publish a second upon the same subject, the 27th of April this year. Perhaps he had a mind to shew, that though he was desirous of having what he had done, confirmed by Parliament, he could, however, proceed without their concurrence, and act by absolute power. Perhaps too, he intended to bring things to a crisis, being incessantly pushed by his popish Counsellors, who were for improving the occasion offered them by the King's zeal. The declaration was as follows:

James Rex,

"OUR conduct has been such in all time, as ought to have persuaded the world, that we are firm and constant to our resolutions: Yet that easy people may not be abused by the malice of crafty wicked men, we think fit to declare, that our intentions are not changed since the 4th of April 1687, when we issued out our declaration for liberty of Conscience, in the following terms:

"(Here the declaration was recited verbatim, and then it follows;) Ever since we granted this indulgence, we have made it our principal care to see it preferred without distinction, as we are encouraged to do daily by multitudes of addresses, and many other assurances we receive from our subjects of all persuasions, as testimonies of their satisfaction and duty; the effects of which we doubt not but the next Parliament will plainly shew; and that it will not be in vain, that we have resolved to use our utmost endeavours to establish liberty of Conscience, on such just and equal foundations, as will render it unalterable, and secure to all people the free exercise of their Religion for ever; by which future ages may reap the benefit, of what is so undoubtedly for the general good of the whole Kingdom. It is such a security we desire, without the burthen and constraint of Oaths and Tests, which have been unhappily made by some Governments, but could never support any: Nor should men be advanced by such means to offices and employments, which ought to be the reward of services, fidelity, and merit. We must conclude, that not only good Christians will join in this, but whoever is concerned for the increase of the wealth and power of the nation. It would, perhaps, prejudice some of our neighbours, who might lose part of those vast advantages they now enjoy, if liberty of Conscience were settled in these Kingdoms, which are, above all others, most capable of improvements, and of commanding the trade of the world. In pursuance of this great work, we have been forced to make many changes both of civil and military officers throughout our dominions, not thinking any ought to be employed in our service, who will not contribute towards establishing the peace and greatness of their country, which we most earnestly desire, as unbiased men may see by the whole conduct of our Government, and by the condition of our fleet, and of our armies, which, with good management, shall be constantly the same, and greater, if the safety, or honour of the nation require it. We recommend these considerations to all our subjects, and that they will reflect on their present ease and happiness, how far above three years that it hath pleased God to permit us to reign over these Kingdoms, we have not appeared to be that Prince, our enemies would have made the world afraid of; our chief aim having been not to be the oppressor, but the father of our People; of which we can give no better evidence, than by conjuring them to lay aside all private animosities, as well as groundless jealousies, and to chuse such members of Parliament, as may do their parts to finish what we have begun for the advantage of the Monarchy, over which Almighty God has placed us; being resolved to call a Parliament, that shall meet in November next at farthest."

The King was not satisfied with publishing this declaration in the usual method, but thinking, without doubt, that in so important an affair, extraordinary formalities were to be observed, he issued out an Order of Council, enjoining the Bishops to cause it to be sent and distributed throughout their several Dioceses, to be read at the usual time of divine Service, in all Churches and Chapels, on certain days named in the order. Some believed, the King had two views in this order, first, to mortify the Church of England, against which he had for some time shewed great resentment: secondly, to lay the Bishops under a necessity, either of making themselves in some measure the instruments of his designs against the Protestant Religion, or of incurring the penalties of their disobedience in case of a refusal.

Upon the receipt of this order, several Bishops, who were in London, assembled at the Archbishop's palace at Lambeth, to consult how they were to behave upon so nice an occasion. For they were necessarily, either in obeying the King, to approve, by their conduct, this violation of the Laws, and betray the interests of the Protestant Religion, or in refusing to obey, to draw upon themselves the penalties which, in all appearance, would be inflicted for their disobedience. These difficulties were debated in this assembly with all the care, so important an affair required, after they had implored the divine assistance by extraordinary prayers. The result of their conference was, that it was better to obey God than Man, and their care being such, that they could not obey the King without betraying their own Consciences, they ought without farther consideration to expose themselves to the approaching storm, rather than sacrifice the interests of God and the Church. This resolution was grounded upon four considerations. 1. That many would justly judge the Clergy either cowards or hypocritical time-servers, in publishing what they thought illegal, and illegally sent to them. 2. That many who had votes for Parliament-men would take this for the con-

1688. sent of the publishers, and be strengthened in the chusing such men as should be friends, not only to the Indulgence, but to the foundation of it, the dispensing Power. 3. That the world would have reason to take their publication for an approbation, because there could be no other intention in ordering it to be published, but to make the Clergy parties to it. 4. That after this they must expect farther things to be published by them, at which they must make a stand; and their making a stand when they had lost their reputation would be of no force.

The petition of the King to be executed from finding it to their Pursuant to this resolution, the consulting Bishops, being seven, before they parted drew up a petition, and subscribing it the same day, the 18th of May, six of them (1) crossed the water to Whitehall to present it to the King, without acquainting any person with their design. Their names were Sancroft Archbishop of Canterbury, Lloyd Bishop of St. Asaph, Kenn of Bath and Wells, Turner of Ely, Lake of Chichester, White of Peterborough, Trelawney of Bristol. Their petition ran thus:

To the King's most Excellent Majesty.

The humble Petition of William Archbishop of Canterbury, and divers of the Suffragan Bishops of that Province, now present with him, in behalf of themselves and other of their absent brethren, and of the inferior Clergy of their respective Dioceses.

Humbly sheweth,

THAT the great avereness they find in themselves, to the distributing and publishing in all their Churches, your Majesty's late declaration for liberty of Conscience, proceeds neither from any want of duty and obedience to your Majesty, (our holy mother the Church of England being, both in her principles and in her constant practice, unquestionably loyal, and having, to her great honour, been more than once publicly acknowledged to be so by your gracious Majesty;) nor yet from any want of tenderness to Dissenters, in relation to whom we are willing to come to such a temper, as shall be thought fit, when the matter shall be considered and settled in Parliament and Convocation: But among many other considerations, from this especially, because that declaration is founded upon such a dispensing power, as hath been often declared illegal in Parliament, and particularly in the years 1662, and 1672, and in the beginning of your Majesty's reign; and is a matter of so great moment and consequence to the whole nation, both in Church and State, that your Petitioners cannot in prudence, honour, or conscience, so far make themselves parties to it, as the distribution of it all over the nation, and the solemn publication of it once and again, even in God's house, and in the time of his divine Service, must amount to, in common and reasonable construction. Your Petitioners therefore most humbly and earnestly beseech your Majesty, that you will be pleased not to insist upon their distributing and reading your Majesty's said Declaration; and your Petitioners, as in duty bound, shall ever pray, &c.

The King's Answer.
 The King, surprized and incensed at this Petition, answered in a very angry tone: I have heard of this before, but did not believe it: I did not expect this from the Church of England, especially from some of you. If I change my mind, you shall hear from me; if not, I expect my command shall be obeyed. The Bishops replied, We resign our selves to the will of God; and then immediately retired.

Id. p. 976.
 The Bishops of Durham and Rochester, both Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and two others (2), caused the declaration to be read in their Dioceses. But it generally happened, wherever it was read, that the congregation immediately left the Church. One Minister, before he began to read it, told his flock, "That he could not refuse the order sent him to read the declaration, but that he knew no order which obliged them to hear it." In London it was read but in four or five Churches (3).

Id.
 Mean time, the Court was unresolved what course to take with the Bishops. Not but that they were determined to come to extremities, rather than quit their designs. However, they did not care to begin with the Bishops, because of the people's reverence for them. Though the King's Council persuaded him to do all things with a high hand, they trembled, however, when they met with any opposition, seeing the great disproportion between the number of Protestants and Papists. They considered, that while every one was submissive, the Lords-Lieutenants of Counties, and the Magistrates, all creatures of the King, had great credit and authority; but should the people happen to grow weary of their obedience, and openly resist, their authority would vanish; and it was not probable, the lesser number should subdue the greater. This had been the case in the reign of Richard II, and very lately in that of Charles I. It seems therefore, that prudence required the King carefully to avoid what might produce a sudden revolution, and not to enter upon violent measures, till he had taken greater precautions. For, upon supposition of a rebellion, which was not impossible, if the Bishops were proceeded against with rigour, was it not a gross error, to rely on a Protestant army to introduce Popery, and force Protestants to submission? But, on the other hand, those who directed the King in his counsels and undertakings, had not his interest chiefly in view, but that of the Catholic Religion. They considered the King only as an instrument to be made use of, at all events, whilst he was alive, for fear they should suddenly lose him. God seems to have blinded this Prince, to prevent his seeing what every one else clearly saw, in order to throw him upon his ruin. He was therefore resolved to proceed with the utmost rigor against the Bishops, and for that purpose they were summoned to appear before the Council the 8th of June.

On their appearance, they were asked, Whether they owned the Petition? The Bishops surprized at this question, since they themselves had presented the Petition, feared some snare was laid for them, and therefore at first forbore to give a direct answer (4). At last, the Archbishop confessed, that it was written with his own hand, and that he had signed it; adding, withal, they had done nothing but what they were ready to justify. The Chancellor endeavoured to make them sensible of the ill-consequences of their disobedience, which tended to diminish the King's authority, and to disturb the peace of the Kingdom. At last, he asked them, whether they would give their recognizances to appear before the Court of King's Bench to answer this high misdemeanour? This they all refused, insisting on the privilege of their Peerage, which they were resolved to maintain, as well as the Rights of the Church, being equally bound by their callings to oppose all innovations both in Government and Religion. The Chancellor surprized at their constancy, threatened to send them to the Tower, and to prosecute them to the utmost rigor of the law, unless they immediately recanted, and withdrew their petition. They unanimously answered, That they were ready to go wherever his Majesty was pleased to send them; that they hoped the King of Kings would be their protector and their judge; that they feared nothing from men; and that having acted according to Law and their own Consciences, no punishments should ever be able to shake their resolutions.

Upon this answer, eighteen Privy-Counsellors, several of them Papists (5), were for sending the Bishops to the Tower. A warrant was immediately drawn and signed for their commitment, the reason given being, For conspiring, making, and publishing a seditious Libel against his Majesty and his Government. It is difficult to conceive, upon what foundation, they could be accused of publishing a petition which they had only delivered to the King himself. However, the Attorney and Solicitor-General, were ordered to prosecute them for the same next Term. It was not thought proper to send them to the Tower through London, for fear it might occasion a tumult. They were therefore in the most private manner conveyed by water. But people hearing of it, flocked in multitudes to the River-side, and upon their knees desired their blessing, with loud acclamations extolling their constancy. The same spectacle was seen at the Tower, where the soldiers of the garrison fell on their knees to beg their blessing. This was a great mortification to the King, and might have convinced him, that he was yet very far from his aim. But, as I said, the design of his counsellors was to make haste and finish the work begun, for fear some accident should deprive them of their instrument.

Two days after the Bishops had been sent to the Tower, the 10th of June, the Queen was delivered of a Prince.

(5) It seems, as the Bishops were going to the Council, they were advised to remember, that no man was obliged by the law to accuse himself.

Accordingly, when the King in Council, hearing the Relation in his hand, asked them whether they had signed it at Paris, they made a low bow and said nothing. What says the King, do you deny your own hands? Upon which they slowly bow'd again. Then the King told them, that they would own it to be their hands upon his word, or all work, not a hair of their head should be touched. Whereupon the Archbishop says, Rejoicing on your Majesty's word, I cannot do it by my hand. And so laid all the rest. Then being ordered to withdraw, when they were called in again, they found the King vanished, and the Jesuits in the chair, who using them very roughly, sent them to the Tower. The Translators said their Particulars from the late Bishop of Durham's own mouth.

1688. who, during the life of his father was known by the name of the Prince of Wales, and afterwards, by some was called the Pretender. His birth was an occasion of triumph to the Papists, but of astonishment and terror to the Protestants, who saw their hopes defeated, that their misfortunes would end with the death of the King. It is universally known, that the birth of this Prince has been very much suspected, and that many did then, and still do, believe it supposititious. Multitudes of papers have been published for and against, some containing the grounds of the suspicions, and others, arguments to remove them. The Reader, doubtless, expects not from a foreigner, the decision of a fact which was never perfectly cleared, the imposture whereof rests only upon conjectures and probabilities, and the truth upon suppositions, which indeed are generally true, but of which it cannot be said, that it is impossible they may be sometimes false. In general, it is very certain, the Queen, during the whole time of her pregnancy, was suspected of a design to impose an heir upon the Kingdom, and this suspicion was very publick. It is also certain, that though the King and Queen knew of this suspicion, they took no care to remove it. On the contrary, their whole conduct, as well during the Queen's pregnancy, as her labour, gave still greater strength to the suspicion. For a negligence which signifies nothing when there is no suspicion, must be remarked when an impostor is suspected. On the other hand, it seems a standing rule, that, when both parents express not any doubt concerning the birth of their child, no person can be sure they are deceived. But this rule is perhaps not so general and certain as many imagine. It is very good where there is no suspicion of a cheat. But in case a presumptive heir, disinherited by the birth of a child, who comes to take his place, has good proofs that the child is supposititious, certainly the bare owning of this child by both parents, will not invalidate proofs, which I suppose to be full. It is not impossible for a man and wife to suppose a child, thro' revenge, or some other interest, in order to deprive a presumptive heir of their inheritance. I say, it is not impossible, though it rarely happens. There are however instances to prove the possibility. Indeed, to decide by law, that a child is supposititious, very convincing proofs must be alledged, because the Judges, who are obliged to follow the rules of law, are not determined by appearances, however probable they may be. But the case is not the same with the publick, on whom very often conjectures grounded upon great probabilities, make as much impression as the strongest proofs. The affair in question having never been legally decided, I can only present the Reader with what has been most probably urged pro and con, in order to assist him either to be determined for or against the pretended supposition of the Prince of Wales, or to show him, that he ought to suspend his judgment, till the thing is more plainly discovered. This I propose to do with impartiality, in producing the arguments alledged on both sides.

Sundry Opinions concerning the Birth of the Prince of Wales.
Echard.
III. p. 863.

There are three opinions concerning the real or pretended birth of the Prince of Wales. The first is, that the Queen was not with child when she pretended to be so, and that at the time of her pretended delivery, a son was supposed as being born of her. The second is, that she was really with child, but that having the misfortune of a miscarriage, she continued still to feign herself big, and at last supposed, or caused to be supposed, a child as born of her body, and that this child dying shortly after, another was substituted in his room, and to this, dying seven weeks after, succeeded another child. The third opinion is, that the Queen was really with child, and delivered the 10th of June of a son, the same who is since called the Pretender, and is now at Rome. In confirmation of the first of these opinions it is alledged: 1. That the King, for certain reasons, was become incapable of children. 2. That the Queen had been seven years without being with child. 3. That now she had never a constant reckoning. 4. That her delivery was sudden, and immediately after the removing of her lodgings. 5. That it was on a Sunday morning, when all the Protestant Court-Ladies were at Church. 6. That neither the Princess Anne of Denmark, the Archbishop of Canterbury, nor the Dutch Ambassador were present at her labour, though they were the three persons who ought principally to have been there. 7. That during the labour, her bed was not left so open as it should have been. 8. That while she went with child, she never satisfied the Princess Anne, and many Protestant Ladies about her, of her bigness, either by letting them feel her belly, or see her breasts. 9. Neither did she show the Princess any of her milk after her lying-in. 10. That during her labour, a warming-pan was brought into the room, though the weather was extreme hot, and the room heated by a vast crowd of people. Lastly, it was alledged, that tho' the King, Queen and Courtiers, sufficiently knew before the delivery, that the nation suspected an imposture, they did not use those precautions as they might and ought to have done in such a case; and, instead of putting it beyond all possibility of doubt, they left so many marks of suspicion, as caused infinite doubts and disputes: insumuch that some Roman Catholics themselves owned, That so important an affair had been managed with great supineness and imprudence. This is what Mr. Echard says, one of the most moderate Historians, who is not to be suspected by the King's adherents.

Dr. Watson is very short in his account of this matter, and contents himself with giving the general opinion, without any thing of his own. These are his words:

"While the Bishops were in the Tower, the Roman Catholics had their hopes crowned with the birth of a pretended Prince of Wales. The fears of a Protestant Successor, had been the only ally that rendered their prosperity less perfect. Now the happiness of having an heir to the Crown, to be bred up in their own Religion, quashed all those fears, and atoned for the uncertainty of the King's life. It was so much their interest to have one, and there were so many circumstances that seemed to render his birth suspicious, that the nation in general were inclinable to believe, that this was the last effort of the party, to accomplish our ruin. But the most circumstantial account of this affair, is that of Dr. Burnet Bishop of Salisbury, in the History of his own Times, published since his death. As I am to make some remarks on his testimony, it will be necessary to insert the following passage, wherein he expressly speaks of the birth of the Prince of Wales.

"I must now look back to England, where the Queen's delivery was the subject of all men's discourse. And since so much depends on this, I will give as full and as distinct an account of all that related to that matter, as I could gather up, either at that time or afterwards. The Queen had been for six or seven years in such an ill state of health, that every winter brought her very near death. Those about her seemed well-assured, that she, who had buried all her children soon after they were born, and had now for several years ceased bearing, would have no more children. Her own Priests apprehended it, and seemed to wish for her death. She had great and frequent distempers, that returned often, which put all people out of their hopes or fears of her having any children. Her spirits were now much on the fret. She was eager in the prosecution of all the King's designs. It was believed, that she had a main hand in driving him to them all. And he, perhaps, to make her gentler to him in his vagrant amours, was more easy to her in every thing else. The Lady Dorchester was come back from Ireland; and the King went often to her. But it was visible, she was not like to gain that credit in affairs, to which she had aspired: And therefore this was less considered.

"She had another mortification, when Fitz-James the King's Son was made Duke of Berwick. He was a soft and harmless young man, and was much beloved by the King: But the Queen's dislike kept him from making any great figure. He made two campaigns in Hungary, that were little to his honour: For, as his Governor diverted the allowance that was given for keeping a table, and sent him always to eat at other tables, so, tho' in the siege of Buda there were many occasions given him to have distinguished himself, yet he had appeared in none of them. There was more care taken of his person, than became his age and condition. Yet his Governor's brother was a Jesuit, and in the secret: So every thing was ventured on by him, and all was forgiven him.

"In September, the former year, the Queen went to the Bath, where the King came and saw her, and staid a few days with her. She after that pursued a full course of bathing: And having resolved to return in the end of September, an accident took her to which the sex is subject; and that made her stay there a week longer. She came to Windsor on the 6th of October. It was said, that at the very time of her coming to the King, her mother, the Duchess of Modena, made a vow to the Lady Loretto, that her daughter might by her means have a son. And it went current, that the Queen believed herself to be with child in that very instant in which her mother made her vow: of which, some travellers have assured me, there was a solemn record made at Loretto. A conception said to be thus begun, looked suspicious. It was now fixed to the 6th of October: So the nine months were run to the 6th of July. She was in the progress of her big belly, let blood several times: And the most straining things that could be proposed were used.

"It was soon observed, that all things about her person were managed with a mysterious secrecy, into which none were admitted but a few Papists. She was not dressed nor undressed with the usual ceremony. Prince George

"George told me, that the Princess went as far in desiring to be satisfied, by feeling the motion, after she said she was quick, as she could go without breaking with her : And she had sometimes staid by her even indecently long in mornings to see her rise, and to give her her shift : But she never did either. She never offered any satisfaction in that matter by letter to the Princess of Orange, nor to any of the Ladies of quality, in whose word the world would have acquiesced. The thing upon this began to be suspected : And some libels were writ, treating the whole as an imposture. The use the Queen made of this, was, to say, that since she saw some were suspecting her capable of so black a contrivance, she scorned to satisfy those who could entertain such thoughts of her. How just forever this might be, with relation to the libellers, yet certainly if she was truly with child, she owed it to the King and herself, to the King's daughters, but most of all to the infant she carried in her belly, to give such reasonable satisfaction, as might put an end to jealousy. This was in her power to do every day : And her not doing it, gave just grounds of suspicion.

"Things went thus on till Monday in Easter week. On that day the King went to Rochester, to see some of the naval preparations ; but was soon sent for by the Queen, who apprehended she was in danger of miscarriage. Dr. Scarborough was come to Knightsbridge to see Bishop Ward, my predecessor, who had been his antient friend, and was then his patient : But the Queen's coach was sent to call him in all haste, since she was near miscarriage. Dr. Windbank, who knew nothing of this matter, staid long that morning upon an appointment for Dr. Walgrave, another of the Queen's Physicians, who, the next time he saw him, excused himself for the Queen, he said, was then under the most apparent signs of miscarriage. Of this the Doctor made oath ; and it is yet extant.

"On the same day, the Countess of Clarendon, being to go out of town for a few days, came to see the Queen before she went, knowing nothing of what had happened to her. And she, being a Lady of the Bed-chamber to the Queen Dowager, did, according to the rule of the Court, go into the Queen's Bed-chamber without asking admittance. She saw the Queen a bed, bemoaning herself in a most doleful manner, saying often, Undone, undone : And one that belonged to her carried somewhat out of the bed, which she believed was linen taken from the Queen. She was upon this in some confusion : And the Countess of Powis coming in, went to her, and said with some sharpness, What do you do here ? And carried her to the door. Before she had got out of the Court, one of the Bed chamber-women followed her, and charged her not to speak of any thing she had seen that day. This matter, whatever was in it, was hushed up : and the Queen held on her course.

"The Princess had miscarried in the spring. So, as soon as she had recovered her strength, the King pressed her to go to the Bath, since that had so good an effect on the Queen. Some of her Physicians, and all her other friends, were against her going. Lower, one of her Physicians, told me, he was against it : He thought, she was not strong enough for the Bath, though the King pressed it with an unusual vehemence. Millington, another Physician, told the Earl of Shrewsbury, from whom I had it, that he was pressed to go to the Princess, and advise her to go to the Bath. The person that spoke to him told him, the King was much set on it ; and that he expected it of him, that he would persuade her to it. Millington answered, He would not advise a patient according to direction, but according to his own reason : So he would not go. Scarborough and Witherby took it upon them to advise it : So she went thither in the end of May.

"As soon as she was gone, those about the Queen did all of the sudden change her reckoning, and began it from the King's being with her at Bath. This came on so quick, that though the Queen had set the fourteenth of June for her going to Windfor, where she intended to lie-in, and all the preparations for the birth and for the children were ordered to be made ready by the end of June, yet now a resolution was taken for the Queen's lying-in at St. James's, and directions were given to have all things quickly ready. The Bath Water either did not agree with the Princess : or the advices of her friends were so pressing, who thought her absence from the Court at that time of such consequence, that in compliance with them she gave it out it did not, and that therefore she would return in a few days.

"The day after the Court had this notice, the Queen said she would go to St. James's, and look for the good hour. She was often told, that it was impossible upon so short a warning to have things ready. But

"she was so positive, that she said, she would live : that night, though the third of June, and at night, though the shorter and quicker way was to go from Whitehall to St. James's through the Park, and she always went that way, yet now by a fortuitous relation, she would be carried thither by Charing, through the Pall Mall. And it was given out by all her train, that she was going to be delivered, some said it would be next morning : And the Priests said very confidently, that it would be a boy.

"The next morning about nine o'clock, she sent word to the King, that she was in labour. The Queen Dowager was next sent for. But no Ladies were sent for : So that no women were in the room, but, two dressers, and one under-dresser, and the midwife. The Earl of Arran sent notice to the Countess of Sunderland ; so she came. The Lady Balfour came also in time. The Protestant Ladies that belonged to the Court were all gone to Church, before the news was let go abroad : For it happened on Trinity Sunday, it being that year on the tenth of June. The King brought over with him from Whitehall a great many Peers and Privy-Councillors. And of these, eighteen were let into the Bed-chamber ; but they stood at the farthest end of the room. The Ladies stood within the alcove. The curtains of the bed were drawn close, and none came within them but the midwife, and an under-dresser. The Queen lay all the while a bed : And in order to the warming one side of it, a warming-pan was brought, but it was not opened, that it might be seen that there was fire and nothing else in it. So here was matter for suspicion, with which all people were filled.

"A little before ten the Queen cried out as in a strong pain, and immediately after the midwife said aloud, she was happily brought to bed. When the Lords all cried out, of what ? the midwife answered, the Queen must not be surprized ; only she gave a sign to the Countess of Sunderland, who upon that touched her forehead, by which, it being the sign before agreed on, the King said he knew it was a boy. No cries were heard from the Child ; nor was it shewed to those in the room. It was pretended more air was necessary. The under-dresser went out of the room with the child ; or somewhat else in her arms to a dressing-room, to which there was a door near the Queen's bed ; but there was another entry to it from other apartments. The King continued with the Lords in the Bed-chamber for some minutes, which was either a sign of much phlegm upon such an occasion ; for it was not known whether the child was alive or dead : or it looked like giving time for some management. After a little while they went all into the dressing-room, and then the news was published. In the mean while, no body was called to lay their hands on the Queen's belly, in order to a full satisfaction. When the Princess came to town, three days after, she had as little satisfaction given her. Chamberlain the man midwife, who was always ordered to attend her labour before, and who brought the plasters for putting back the milk, wondered that he had not been sent to. He went according to custom with the plasters : But he was told they had no occasion for him. He fancied that some other person was put in his place ; but he could not find that any had it. All that concerned the milk, or the Queen's purgations, was managed still in the dark. This made all people inclined more and more to believe, there was a base imposture now put on the nation. That still increased. That night one Hemings, a very worthy man, an Apothecary by his trade, who lived in St. Martin's-Lane, the very next door to a family of an eminent Papist, (Brown brother to the Viscount Montacute, lived there,) the wall between his parlour and theirs being so thin, that he could easily hear any thing that was said with a louder voice ; he (Hemings) was reading in his parlour late at night, when he heard one coming into the neighbouring parlour, and say with a doleful Voice, the Prince of Wales is dead : Upon which a great many that lived in the House came down stairs very quick : Upon this confusion he could not hear any thing more ; but it was plain, they were in a great consternation. He went with the news next morning to the Bishops in the Tower. The Countess of Clarendon came thither soon after, and told them, she had been at the young Prince's door, but was denied access : She was amazed at it ; and asked if they knew her : They said they did, but that the Queen had ordered, that no person whatsoever should be suffered to come in to him. This gave credit to Hemings's story, and looked as if all was ordered to be kept shut up close, till another child was found. One, that saw the child two days after, said to me, that he looked strong, and not like a child so newly born. Wind-bark met Walgrave the day after his birth, and remembered him of what he had told him eight weeks before. He acknowledged what he had said, but added, that God wrought miracles: To which no reply could or durst he made by the other: it needed none. So healthy a child being so little like any of those the Queen had born, it was given out, that he had fits, and could not live. But those who saw him every day observed no such thing. On the contrary, the child was in a very prosperous state. None of those fits ever happen'd, when the Princess was at Court; for she could not be denied admittance, though all others were. So this was believed to be given out to make the matter more credible. It is true, some weeks after that, the Court being gone to Windſor, and the child sent to Richmond, he fell into such fits, that four Physicians were sent for. They all looked on him as a dying child. The King and Queen were sent for. The Physicians went to a dinner prepared for them, and were often wondering that they were not called for. They took it for granted, that the child was dead. But, when they went in after dinner to look on him, they saw a found healthy child, that seemed to have had no sort of illness on him. It was said, that the child was strangely recovered of a sudden. Some of the Physicians told Lloyd, Bishop of St. Asaph, that it was not possible for them to think it was the same child. They looked on one another, but durst not speak what they thought.

Thus I have related such particulars as I could gather of this birth: To which some more shall be added, when I give an account of the proof that the King and Queen afterwards put this matter out of doubt; but which is more doubtful than ever. I took most of these from the informations that were sent over to the Prince and Princess of Orange, as I had many from the vouchers themselves. I do not mix with these, the various reports that were, both then and afterwards, spread of this matter, of which Bishop Lloyd has a great collection, most of them well attested. What truth soever may be in these, this is certain, that the method in which this matter was conducted from first to last was very unaccountable. If an imposture had been intended, it could not have been otherwise managed. The pretended excuse that the Queen made, that she owed no satisfaction to those who could suspect her capable of such base forgery, was the only excuse that she could have made, if it had been really what it was commonly said to be. She seemed to be soon recovered, and was so little altered by her labour, either in her looks or voice, that this helped not a little to increase jealousies. The rejoycings over England upon this birth were very cold and forced. Bonfires were made in some places, and a set of congratulatory addresses went round the nation. None durst oppose them. But all was formal, and only to make a shew.

After having related what has been said by Mr. Echard, and the Bishop of Salisbury, on the birth of the Prince of Wales, I shall make some remarks on this subject.

1. If the accounts of these two famous writers be carefully examined, it will doubtless be surprising, to find a sort of contradiction between them. For the suspicions mentioned by the first, are, that the Queen, though the pretended to be, yet was not with child. Nay, the Bishop of Salisbury seems at first to support this suspicion, by speaking of her great and frequent distempers; of her having for several years ceased bearing; of her having buried all her children soon after they were born; of her refusing to give satisfaction to the Princess of Denmark, and the Protestant Ladies of the Court. Nevertheless, he says positively afterwards, that she was really with child the 6th of October (1), and that in Easter week she had a miscarriage, that is, six months after conception. If this be true, it very plainly follows, that all the suspicions entertained of the Queen from the beginning of January, (the time of her declared pregnancy) to Easter week, ought to vanish, though she had been less careful of giving satisfaction to the publick, than she was. Assuredly this negligence is not capable to invalidate the reality of her pregnancy, if she had a miscarriage in the beginning of her seventh month. What the Prince of Denmark told Dr. Burnet of his Princess's fruitless endeavours to see the Queen rise, cannot serve to confirm the suspicion of an imposture, unless it appear, that this was from the Monday before Easter, to the 10th of June (2). But the Bishop fixes no time. It might even be inferred from the order observed by the Bishop in his story, that what he says concerning the Princess of Denmark, passed between January and Easter week. But, supposing the reality of the pregnancy, it is clear, that the Queen might have given satisfaction to the Princess, and the Protestant Court-Ladies. And it cannot be denied, that she committed a great error in refusing to do it. But it is certain, this refusal proves nothing, if it be true that she was with child, at least till Easter week. The times are therefore carefully to be distinguished. Her obstinacy to give no satisfaction, from January, when she declared herself with child, to Easter week, can be ascribed only to an unseasonable and preposterous haughtiness. But it may be suspected, that from Easter week, to the 10th of June, she still pretended to be with child, when she was no longer so, and that she produced another at the time of her pretended delivery. Thus all the suspicions concerning the reality of her pregnancy, are to be included within the space of two months. For in the year 1688, Easter-day was the 15th of April; the Queen had a miscarriage the Monday before Easter, on the 9th of April; and she was delivered the 10th of June. But no time is fixed for this refusal of satisfaction to the publick, though, the Queen being six months gone when she miscarried, she might, for some time, have caused the motion of the child to be perceived.

2. In the Bishop of Salisbury's account, are four several children. The first, which really belonged to the Queen, was an untimely birth of six months. The second was supposed at the time of her pretended delivery, and died the same day. The third was brought in the room of the dead child, and died also some weeks after at Richmond. The fourth, substituted in the room of the third, must be the present Pretender. It is surprising, that Mr. Echard, who probably writ the History of this reign, but twenty or twenty-five years after the time I am speaking of, should have heard nothing of these two last impostures, but confine himself to one, in what he relates concerning the publick suspicions.

3. Fuller who pretended to give an exact account of the cheats, agrees not with the Bishop of Salisbury. But I shall not insist on his testimony, because his pretended discovery has been little regarded.

4. It remains therefore to examine what the Bishop of Salisbury says, to make us suspect the supposition of the three last children. For, the first, which was but a miscarriage, according to this author, was really the Queen's. To this end, we are to distinguish three different times, namely, before, at, and after her delivery. I shall make some observations upon the most remarkable circumstances of each of these times.

1. The King's pressing the Princess to go to the Bath, agrees very well with the design of supposing an heir. For the presence of the Princess at the Queen's pretended delivery, must have been perplexing, on account of her interest to detect the imposture. Had the King contented himself with barely advising her to go to the Bath, nothing could have been inferred from it, but that he thought the Bath good for her health. But his pressing it with an unusual vehemence, and causing a Physician to be told, that he expected it of him that he would persuade her to it, seem to discover some secret design, especially, when it is considered, that an imposture was already suspected. This suspicion is farther confirmed by the change of the Queen's reckoning, and by her delivery two days after it was known, that the Princess was upon the point of returning from the Bath. But there must not be given to this cause of suspicion, more strength than it really has. For as it is very possible for the King to have believed, that the Bath would be of service to the Princess his daughter, the suspicion of his acting from another motive, is founded only upon the supposition of an imposture. If this was well proved, the King's proceeding would become a sort of a new proof. But as it is not, it seems that the suspicion ought not to be supported by the supposition of the fact in question.

2. If it is true, that the Queen did not believe herself with child till the 6th of October, and that she afterwards suddenly changed her reckoning, there is reason to suspect some mystery in it. And indeed, by this new reckoning she was to be brought to bed during the absence of the Princess of Denmark, whereas by the first she could not be delivered till after her return. To this may be added, that if it is true, that about the end of September she was stopped at the Bath, one week longer than she intended, by an accident to which the sex is subject, she could not be with child from the 10th of September, nor consequently brought to bed the 10th of June. To this it is answered, that these reckonings are common to the whole sex. But this reason cannot take place here, because it did not appear that the Queen thought herself mistaken.

3. It cannot be denied, that there is something extraordinary in the Queen's sudden resolution, of going to live in

1) He only says, "it went current, that the Queen believed herself to be with child on 22nd Nov. 68." p. 133.

2) It is here proper to take notice of a passage in Bishop Salisbury's account, p. 133, where, after he is dissatisfied by feeling the motion, after the Queen says she was quick, "he could go without breaking with her." 224.

1688. at St. James's, when things were not ready. Hitherto no probable reason has been given of this sudden change, to show that the could lie-in more commodiously at St. James's than at Whitehall, nor why she at first chose Windsor for the place, and fixed the time to the beginning of July.

4. I own I see nothing in the Queen's affectation of being carried to St. James's by Charing-Cross, through the Pall-Mall, to confirm the suspicion of an imposture.

5. I never heard, that the presence of the Archbishop of Canterbury is absolutely necessary at the delivery of the Queens of England, especially at that of a popish Queen, who could have no great need of his assistance.

As for the time of the Queen's delivery, there are many things to be examined.

1. The Queen after having declared her intention to lie-in at St. James's, without any apparent necessity, was bent to go thither on the Saturday, though nothing was ready. This is a sign, she thought it would be too late if she deferred going until the next day. It is therefore clear, that she expected the moment of her delivery every hour, and yet when she began to find herself ill, No women were in the room but two dressers, one under-dresser, and the midwife. Not one foreign Lady was in the Palace. It cannot be denied, that this was very extraordinary for a Queen, since it was so easy to have other Ladies at hand to assist her, and the more, as she hourly expected the moment of her delivery. It is no less extraordinary, that none of the Court-Ladies were called besides the Countess of Sunderland, by the particular care of the Earl of Arran; and the Queen-Dowager, who lodged in Somerfet-House, a great way from St. James's. All this seems to discover, it was not desired that many Ladies should be present at the labour. To this it is answered, that the Queen was surprized, as women frequently are, and that the Protestant Ladies were at Church. But some take occasion from hence to confirm their suspicion. They suppose, the Queen would not have gone with so much precipitation on Saturday night, to St. James's, if she had not known she should be delivered the next morning, while the Protestant Ladies were employed at their devotions. But after all, this is only a suspicion. For, who can be sure, that the Queen acted by the motive ascribed to her? All that can be said, is, that the point in question being a child who, if a boy, was to take place of a Princess, presumptive heir of the King her father, the King and Queen ought to have put his birth out of all doubt. Instead of this, they confirmed, by a mysterious conduct, suspicions which were already but too far spread, and of which they could not be ignorant. The Empress Constance, wife of Henry VI, proving with child at the age of fifty-two years, chose a place the most publick for her labour, and thereby removed all suspicion of the birth of her child. On the contrary, the Queen of King James II. for having neglected all precautions, has left upon her son, real or pretended, a blot which has not yet been effaced.

2. The King's being at the further end of the room with eighteen Peers and Privy-Counsellors, is a circumstance which proves nothing at all. It is well known, that on these occasions men approach not the bed, to be eye-witnesses of what passes there. All they can do, is to be attentive to the cries of the mother, or the infant. Besides the King himself was not less suspected than the Queen.

3. As to the warming-pan brought into the Queen's chamber, and which is supposed to have in it a new-born child, this is only a conjecture founded upon the seeming uselessness of a warming-pan the 10th of June, which proved an excessive hot day. To this it is answered, that a labour is often attended with a quaking and trembling like an ague, which begins with a cold fit. This is what I know nothing of. It is also pretended, that it was impossible to put a new-born child, in the narrow compass of a warming-pan, without stifling it.

4. It is very extraordinary, that the Queen was not a full hour in labour; for the King was sent for at nine o'clock, and before ten the Queen was delivered. She cried out but once, in the moment of her delivery. When the mind is filled with suspicions, such circumstances help to confirm them. Those who are not in the same disposition, find nothing extraordinary in this; because the Queen had ever had easy and quick labours.

5. It is commonly true, that children, the moment they are born, and exposed to the air, are heard to cry. But I know not whether this can be considered as infallible. However, the Queen having neglected to give undoubted proofs of her pregnancy, every little uncommon circumstance was capable to confirm the suspicion of an imposture.

6. As to the fires that is laid upon the curtains of the bed being close drawn, this cannot seem strange, since there were eighteen Lords in the room.

7. The circumstance of the child's being not shewn, can cause no suspicion, but on supposition of the suspicion itself, which ought to have been removed, by showing the child as it came from the womb. For, otherwise, it is not usually done, till the midwife has taken due care of the child. But if this is urged to prove, that a child was not taken out of the Queen's bed, the suspicion of the warming-pan must necessarily be suppressed, for had a child been put in the pan, it could also be taken out of it.

8. What is said of the King's continuing with the Lords some minutes in the Bed-chamber, and that it looked like giving time for some management, is a gloss which deserves little or no notice.

9. Those who believe the child in question not born of the Queen, would have had her take all the precautions which they themselves imagine, to destroy all sort of doubt, and the omission of one of these precautions is, with them, sufficient to confirm their suspicions.

10. If no satisfaction was given to the Princess of Denmark after her return from the Baths, it may be alleged, that she discovered no jealousy concerning the birth of the Prince of Wales, and as she appeared convinced of the truth, there was no necessity of giving her proofs.

11. The refusal of Chamberlain's plaisters would be very apt to cause a suspicion, if it was impossible for the Queen's breasts not to want them. But how many labours are there, which have no need of remedies for putting back the milk? However, the Bishop of Salisbury obviates this answer, by saying, that in her former labours, the Queen had always great plenty of milk.

12. What is said of the Queen's recovering so soon after her delivery, proves nothing. Some mothers have so easy labours, that in a few days one can hardly perceive any alteration in them. Besides, it is too general an expression to say, the Queen seemed to be soon recovered. The precise time should have been marked, that it might be judged, whether there was any thing extraordinary in it.

Nevertheless, all these reasons of suspicion laid together, make an impression upon many men, which each in particular would not be able to do. We must always recur to this point, that the King and Queen, knowing that they were suspected of an imposture, ought to have taken just measures to remove the suspicion, and not having done it, it is not very strange, it should continue to this day.

As to what passed after the delivery, I mean the supposition of two children, when the first was dead, the Bishop of Salisbury's account rests only upon the credit of some persons whom he has given for vouchers, and of others not named by him. There are besides several particulars, in proof of which he produces no testimony.

He supposes, that the child of which it was pretended the Queen was delivered, died the same day. This supposition is grounded upon what Hemings heard through the wall of his parlour, and upon the denial of access at the young Prince's door to the Countess of Glarendon. All this may be of some weight, when a bare suspicion only is meant to be established. But if it is produced as a proof, the insufficiency of it, is easily seen.

The death of the second child at Richmond stands only upon the report of four Physicians, who were sent for to visit him. The Bishop does not make the Physicians positively say that the child died, but only that, They all looked on him as a dying child, and as they were not called for after dinner, They took it for granted that the child was dead. But this consequence is not absolutely necessary; for possibly they were not called, because the child grew better. But, says the Bishop, When they went in after dinner to look on the child, they saw a sound healthy child, that seemed to have had no illness on him. They inferred from this, that he was not the same child, and the Bishop concludes that the first was dead, and another put in his room. What is particular in this fact, is, that these four Physicians doubted, this was the same child, only because the first had been sick, and this was found and healthy, as if all children at such an age were so like one another, that no feature could distinguish them. And yet, these Physicians thought, it was not the same child, only by the difference between a state of health and sickness. This is very surprising, since naturally the faces of the two children must have been so different, as not to need other marks (1).

In short, the Bishop of Salisbury's whole account of these three impostures, rests either upon hearsay, or what he read

(1) Colonel Sands, who died in 1738, being in 1688. Gentleman-walter to the Princess Ann, was sent by her from Tunbridge (where she then was) to Court, to enquire after her brother's health. Going up immediately to the King without ceremony or interruption, as is usual in such cases, he came into the Room where the Prince lay. He saw there a pale long visaged Child, with red spots in his face, and other marks of weakness. This struck him so, that he took very particular notice of it; but presently after the Ladies in the room came and turned him out, saying, the Prince was a sleep. At his going out he met the King, who asked him with a disturbed countenance, whether he had seen the Prince? Sands telling he had done something amiss, denied it; upon which the King's countenance cleared up. Some time after he was called to look at the Prince; but saw a child of very different looks and complexion from that which he found before. All these particulars he committed to writing, and carried them to the Princess. Contin. of Baker's Chron. Edit. 1730. p. 732.

1683. in the informations sent to the Prince and Princess of Orange; for he was then at the Hague. The fenders of the informations were, probably, no friends of King James. It is therefore very possible, not to say likely, that they have aggravated their reports, and collected every circumstance, true or false, which was apt to persuade the Prince and Princess, that the Prince of Wales was supposititious. As for the Bishop of Salisbury, I am persuaded, he has related nothing but what he either heard, read, or believed to be true. But who can say, he was not deceived by prejudiced persons, who looked upon their suspicions as so many convincing proofs? I am aware, that all the English have not the same opinion of Dr Burnet as I have. Volumes of remarks upon his History, in which he is violently abused, demonstrate, that the Jacobites consider him as the sworn enemy of James II. and as deserving no credit. But as, for very good reasons, they have not thought proper to make remarks upon what he says of three supposititious children, it is not my business to guess what they could have said. I presume therefore he has invented nothing, without pretending, however, to warrant what he says upon the testimony of others.

I have enlarged upon the birth of the Prince of Wales, because there seemed to me to be great confusion, as well in the books, as in the discourses on this subject. My intent was to help the reader, to determine for or against, or to suspend his judgment till the thing is more fully cleared. As the principal design of History is to establish facts that are certain, to destroy those that are false, and to inform the readers of the grounds of doubting with regard to such as are dubious, I imagined, that in an affair so important as this, which has made so much noise, and will doubtless, yet long be talked of, the reader would be glad to know what to rely on. Thus much is certain, that most Protestants believed the Prince of Wales supposititious, chiefly because it would have been very disadvantageous to them, that James II. should have had a popish successor. The Papists, on the contrary, questioned not this Prince's birth, because nothing could be more serviceable to their Religion. I am persuaded, there were few, either Papists or Protestants, but what were determined on this point, by their prejudices. But things having taken an unexpected turn, the truth or falsity of this Prince's birth have hitherto produced none of the effects which were hoped or feared (1).

The assurance of a popish successor, made the King hope, he should more easily accomplish his designs. But he wished, above all things, for the concurrence of a Parliament. It was with this view, that cloistings were once more put in practice. He cloistred such as he intended to gain. Promises and menaces were employed, and those who refused to serve the King in his own way, as the word was, might assure themselves of his heaviest displeasure.

However, he neglected not more effectual means to force his subjects to compliance. He ordered some entire regiments out of Ireland, and filled many vacancies in his English regiments, with Irish and popish officers. This gave so great a disgust to the whole army, that lampoons and ballads were vented upon the Irish, who were mortally hated by the English, especially since the massacre in 1641.

Mean while, that the King's design in augmenting his forces might not be doubted, an address, supposed to be drawn by a Jesuit, was procured from the city of Carlisle, particularly, "To thank his Majesty for his royal army, which really was both the honour and safety of the nation; let the Tacklers think and say what they would." And upon this occasion the addressers assured his Majesty, "That when, in his great wisdom, he should think fit to call a Parliament, they would chuse such members as would certainly concur with his Majesty, in taking off the penal Laws and Tests, and not hazard the election of any person, who had any ways declared in favour of those Cannibal Laws. Surely, said they, these men that oppose your Majesty in so gracious and glorious a work, do not consider what a Sovereign Prince, by his royal power, may do. A work which heaven smiles upon, and will reward with no less a blessing, we hope, than a Prince of Wales."—

During the publick rejoicings for the birth of the Prince of Wales, the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the other six Bishops, prisoners in the Tower, were brought to their trials at the King's Bench bar the 15th of June. But upon their motion for a delay, the trial was put off to the 29th of the same month, and in the mean time they were set at liberty upon their own recognizance. The 29th of June, Westminster-Hall was crowded with great numbers of Lords, Gentlemen, and others, to be spectators of this famous trial. The King's Counsel pleaded, That the petition presented by the Bishops was a real and seditious libel, tending to diminish the King's prerogative, and excite sedition amongst the people. The Counsel for the Bishop, on the other side, retorted the arguments of their adversaries with great force and freedom, proving, that the King having no power to dispense with penal Laws, a petition humbly presented to remonstrate to him that he had no such power, ought not to be esteemed a libel: That it was injurious to the Bishops, to accuse them of having published a petition, which they had respectfully presented to the King in private, and alone: That the occasion of presenting it was not sought by them, but pressed upon them: Nor could it be called a libel, because the intent was innocent, and they kept within the bounds set by Act of Parliament. After long pleadings on both sides, the Judges, in giving directions to the Jury, were not unanimous. There were four, of whom Wright the Chief Justice, and Holloway, were the King's creatures. Powell was reckoned a man of perfect integrity, and Alybone was a Papist. Wright gave his opinion, That the petition presented by the Bishops was a libel. Holloway said, That if the Jury were satisfied that the petition was presented with no ill intention, but only to shew the reason of the petitioners disobedience to the King's command, he could not think it to be a libel. Powell maintained, That the petition could not be a libel, because it was founded upon the King's incapacity to dispense with laws, which was very true. Alybone asserted, That the crime of the Bishops, was next door to treason (2).

The Jury withdrawing fate up all night, whether they could not agree, or to render their verdict more solemn. The next morning the Court being assembled, and the Hall filled with infinite crowds of people, the Jury pronounced the Bishops Not Guilty. Immediately shouts of joy were heard through the crowd, and the loudst exclamations resounded through the cities of Westminster and London. For several hours, nothing was heard but repeated shouts of both cities, transported with the news of the Bishops acquittal. Nor was this all. For the King being gone that morning to the army on Hounslow-Heath, and dining in the Earl of Feversham's tent, the news flew to the camp, where the whole army shouted to loud, that it startled the King, and his whole company. The Earl of Feversham being sent out to know what was the matter, immediately returned, and told the King, It was nothing but the shouts of the soldiers upon the news of the Bishops being acquitted. Do you call that nothing? said the King; but so much the worse for them. Notwithstanding the resentment expressed by the King, and his severe prohibitions against all riotous assemblies, the whole city was that night illuminated, and numberless bonfires proclaimed the general joy. This was followed by almost all the great towns in the Kingdom, and at Norwich particularly the joy was excessive. This was a sensible mortification to the King. He at first threatened to deliver the Bishops to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and to show his indignation, he dismissed Sir Richard Holloway and Sir John Powell, and filled their places with others (3).

The King perceiving the people's disposition was not favorable to him, he resolved at last to come to open force. But as he could only make use of his army, he was willing first to try how far he might depend on their obedience. For this purpose, he thought fit to communicate his design to every regiment singly, not doubting, that if two or three submitted, the rest would follow their example. Accordingly, the Major of the Lord Lichfield's regiment was ordered to tell the officers and soldiers, that those who were unwilling to contribute to the repeal of the Test and Penal Laws, should lay down their arms. But it was with the utmost astonishment that he saw the whole regiment, two captains and a few Popish soldiers excepted, instantly lay down their arms. He remained for sometime speechless, but at last recovering his surprize, he commanded the soldiers to take up their arms again, and suddenly told them, That for the future he would not do them the honour to ask their advice.

It was now easy to foresee, that with a Protestant army he should never be able to introduce Popery. Wherefore he resolved to cashier many Protestant officers and soldiers, and to put Papists in their room. Accordingly he began with some regiments; but it gave a disgust to the whole

(2) Alybone's opinion is not here truly represented. What he affirmed was, that neither the Bishops, nor any other men, had power to invade with matter, relating to the Government. And he confirmed his assertion by an instance in James I. time, when it was declared to be high misdemeanor, and next to Treason, to petition the King to put the penal Laws in execution. In which it seems he was mistaken; for the Petition related to, was a Petition against the Penal Laws. See State Trials, Tom. IV. p. 394.

army. Shortly after, resolving to put thirty High soldiers at the Duke of Berwick's regiment, Lieutenant Colonel Beaumont, and other officers, remonstrated to the Duke, "That neither those Gentlemen nor himself thought it consistent with their honours, to have foreigners imposed upon them,——and therefore humbly petitioned, that they might have leave to fill up their companies with such men of their own nation, as they should judge most suitable to the King's service; or otherwise, that they might be permitted, with all imaginable duty and respect, to lay down their commissions." An account of this being transmitted to the King, he immediately ordered the Lieutenant Colonel, and five Captains to be taken into custody, and tried by a Court-martial as mutineers. It was at first believed, that his intention was to cause them to be condemned to die, but some news from abroad altered the sentence, and they were only cashiered. The fleet was no better disposed than the army to assist the King in his designs. This appeared in that Vice-Admiral Strickland ordering Masts to be laid on board his ship, there arose such a mutiny and disorder amongst the sailors, that the officers could hardly save the Priest from being thrown over board.

The King's situation was such, that it seemed he could neither advance, nor recede. His zeal for his Religion, his principles of Government, his temper naturally obstinate, his condescension to the Queen, Priests, and Jesuits, who incessantly surrounded him, allowed him not to leave his work unfinished. Besides, he must have changed his whole system, as well as his whole Council, and nothing is more rare than to see a Prince proceed in that manner, before he is forced to it. But, on the other hand, he could easily perceive, how far he still was from his end, by the disposition of his Subjects, his fleet, and his army. He hoped however to surmount all obstacles, because, though one part of his people showed a reluctance to submit to his will, another part seemed disposed to receive the yoke with submission. There were Bishops who had caused the Declaration for Liberty of Conscience to be read in their Dioceses, as the Bishops of Durham, Cheshire, and Rechester. Nay, the first had suspended thirty of his Clergy, for refusing to read it (1). In Cheshire, some Curates, Rectors, and others, not contented to read the Declaration, presented also an address, wherein they tell his Majesty,——"That if the matter of the Declaration were not according to their wishes, yet the publishing of it was according to their duty, since it issued out from the express Prerogative of his Supremacy over them; so that they could not but with trouble of mind hear of the proceedings of the seven Bishops, who, though they tenderly promised the Dissenters something, yet refused to do their part about the Declaration, lest they should be Parties to it, which reason the addressers esteem insufficient. They therefore, in all submission, become earnest, though too mean, intercessors to his Majesty, in behalf of the Church of England, that the faults of these and others may not be laid to her charge, in whose communion there were many, and they hoped there would be more, who concurred in promoting the purposes of his mild Government: And so conclude with begging leave to make their congratulations for the happy birth of the young Prince in his Hereditary Successive Kingdom."

The King flattered by such addresses, and imagining, that terror would by degrees oblige his Subjects to submit to his pleasure, resolved to push his point at all events. But, on the other hand, he had the mortification to hear, that a son of Cartwright Bishop of Cheshire, who had procured this address, was refused to be admitted to a Fellowship in one of the Colleges at Oxford, and that Gifford, nominated by him to the See of that city, was likewise denied his Doctor's degree.

But the resolution taken by the King and his Council was not to be shaken by any obstacles. Tho' the seven Bishops had been acquitted of the pretended crime laid to their charge, the new Ecclesiastical Court did not think itself bound by that precedent. Wherefore, the commissioners, by an order made the 12th of July, "Commanded all Chancellors, Archdeacons, Commissaries, and Officials, to enquire in what Churches and Chapels his Majesty's Declaration was read, and to transmit an account thereof upon the 16th day of August next." But the greatest part of those to whom the order was directed, never took any notice of it. The commissioners being met on that day, were not a little puzzled how to proceed. At last, after a long consultation, they were contented to renew their first order, "Requiring all persons having Ecclesiastical jurisdiction, to transmit to them upon the 6th day of December next, an account of the enquiry they are hereby commanded to make in their Visitations, together with the names of the Parsons, Rectors, Vicars, and Curates, that had cither obeyed, or disobeyed his Majesty's command." The affairs which happened before the expiration of that term, hindered that it was not known what the Ecclesiastical Court intended to do, or whether this order would have been better obeyed than the former.

Doctor Sprat Bishop of Rechester, one of the Bishops of the new Ecclesiastical Court, now thought it time to withdraw. Wherefore he writ to his Colleagues a letter, wherein he told them: "That since their Lordships were resolved to proceed against those, who had not complied with the King's command in reading his Declaration, it was absolutely impossible for him to serve his Majesty any longer in that communion." He proceeds farther and says, "That though I myself did submit in that particular, yet I will never be any ways instrumental in punishing those my brethren who did not: For, as I call God to witness, that what I did was merely upon a principle of Conscience, so I am fully satisfied, that their forbearance was upon the same principle." This Bishop was one of those on whom the Court relied, and therefore his defection could not but trouble the King extremely. Several have thought, that the principal motive of this proceeding, was to screen himself in time from the approaching storm, of which he had received some intimation.

From the Prince's birth, those who had any concern for their Religion or Country, saw clearly the danger with which both were threatened. It was evident, that the King no longer pretended to govern by the laws of the land, but according to his will and pleasure. He had sufficiently discovered his intention; so that nothing less than a total subversion of the Government in Church and State could be expected. If this did not sufficiently authorize the most considerable members of the State to take measures for the prevention of such a design, it is hard to conceive, what difference there can be between a Government, like that of England, limited by laws, and an absolute Monarchy. And yet it cannot be doubted, that the Government of England is different from that of most other States. I am very sensible this point is not without difficulty, and that it is not easy in England to fix the limits of the Subjects obedience. Whilst the Church of England preposterously believed, that the King had no design to alter the form of the Government, but intended only a little to enlarge his Prerogative, instead of thinking proper to oppose it, the believed it for her advantage, as it might prevent attempts like those which had occasioned so many mischiefs in the reign of Charles I. The Presbyterians, the Independents, the Anabaptists, had carried the principles of the Republicans so far, and drawn such terrible consequences from them, that after the Restoration of Charles II., it was thought in some manner necessary to run into the other extrem, by investing the King with a power, which, rightly considered, might have had consequences not less dangerous than the Republican principles. But herein the sole aim was to curb the Nonconformists, by the King's authority, without foreseeing, that a time might come, when the King would use the power ascribed to him, against all his Subjects in general, and the Church of England in particular. That time being come under James II., the Church of England opened her eyes, though a little too late, and saw that she had been labouring for her own destruction, in maintaining, and even openly preaching Passive-Obedience, without any restriction. It was from this doctrine, inculcated so carefully, and so long upon the minds of the English, as essential to the Church, that those submissive addresses proceeded, which were daily presented to the King. And indeed, as no bounds had been set to Passive-Obedience, many people did not conceive that they could, with a safe conscience, refuse an unlimited obedience to the Sovereign. But at last, the danger of the Kingdom convinced men of sense, that the royal authority was necessarily to be bounded, otherwise the Church and State were going to be ruined.

Such being the situation of affairs, several Church of England men, both of the Clergy and Laity, thought it time to take measures for stopping the King's progress, and bounding his power. Though they had themselves carried it very high, they chose rather to retract, than, by their obstinacy, to throw the Church and State into imminent danger, in continuing to maintain a doctrine which could justly be considered as the principal fountain of the Kingdom's calamities.

The first and most necessary precaution taken by them, was to form a strict union between the Church of England and the Non-conformists, for their common security. This union was become more easy than ever. The two parties agreed, that their division had been the sole cause of their ruin. This was a strong motive for their union. The Churchmen acknowledged, they had carried passive obedience too far, and that it had produced ill effects. They 1688. showed a readiness to comply with the scruples of the Presbyterians, in relinquishing the ceremonies which might be considered as indifferent, or at least to leave every man at liberty to practise, or not practise them. This was all the Presbyterians could reasonably expect. In short, as the Churchmen appeared touched with the calamities occasioned by their excessive rigor, so they seemed disposed to more clemency; it things were restored to their former state. The Presbyterians, who had hitherto groundlessly accused the Church of England of leaning to Popery, could not forbear acknowledging their error, after the firmness of the seven Bishops had discovered the injustice of that accusation. These dispositions being well managed by prudent and well-meaning men of both parties, produced at last an uniformity of sentiments, with regard to the principal point in question, namely, That it was absolutely necessary to think of means for the preservation of Religion and the State, from the impending danger. The leading men on both sides, took great pains to curb the passionate, whose views were very narrow. In a word, without the King's knowledge, the Whigs and Tories were reconciled, and resolved to labour jointly for the preservation of their country. But unfortunately, this union ended with the danger. However, it may be affirmed, that this reconciliation of the two parties was the most fatal blow that could be given to the King's affairs, since his greatest strength lay in their division. Father Orban calls this union, a league against the King. It would be needless to dispute about this term. The question is only to know, whether this union, this league, or whatever else it may be called, was contrary to law, to conscience, to the duty which subjects owe to their Sovereign. But to decide this question, the Government of England must be distinguished from that of other States, and on pretence of the name of King, common to so many Princes, the rights of one Sovereign not confounded with those of another, in order to apply to a King of England, whatever is asserted of Sovereignty in general. This was an artifice frequent with James I. The question therefore is to know, whether, in supposing the constitution of England such as it appears in this History, James II. had violated it in the most essential parts; whether he had now changed or considerably altered it; whether there was ground to fear an entire subversion; and whether the English were obliged to suffer it without opposition. Of this the readers may judge, from what they have hitherto seen. But in supposing even that James II. had changed, or designed to change the Constitution, a strong objection lay against those, who believed it proper to oppose the entire execution of his designs; namely, the frequent declarations of the Parliament and the Church of England, since the restoration, that an unlimited obedience was due to the King. This objection was so strongly impressed on the minds of some Churchmen, that they could not resolve to oppose the King's designs, because they looked on such opposition as an act of rebellion. Nay, many persist in this opinion even to this day, and with the Papists form the party of the Jacobites. Happily for England, most of the Clergy and Laity of the established Church were of a contrary opinion, and laboured effectually for the preservation of Religion, and the Government, in conjunction with the Whigs, who made no scruple of uniting with them in the same design.

The union between the Whigs and Tories being effected, several persons of distinction, as well amongst the Clergy as the Laity, began to form a scheme for the execution of the great design to preserve the Church and State. They saw no expedient more proper, than to put the Prince of Orange at the head of the party against the King. That Prince was so interferred in the affair, that it was not doubted, he would contribute whatever lay in his power, both to save England, and secure the succession to the Princess his wife, lately defeated of her right by a Prince, who generally passed for supposititious. These were very powerful motives to actuate the Prince of Orange. But there was still another, which was naturally to have a great effect upon him; namely, the extreme danger to which Holland would be exposed, in case the King accomplished his design, by reason of the close union between the Kings of England and France. It was with this view that several great men timely repaired to the Hague, on divers pretences, to confer with the Prince of Orange. The first were, Mr. Stidley, brother to Algernon Stidley, (beheaded in the last reign) afterwards Earl of Rumney, Sir Robert Peyton, Sir Rowland Gwin, Dr. Burnet, and others. It is to be presumed, that assurances were transmitted from them to their friends in England, of the good inclination of the Prince to the common cause. In July, one Joseph Flight brought over into England about fourscore letters from persons of quality and credit, and carried back answers to the Hague. The affair being thus begun, the old Lord Ilchester pretending a journey into Germany, passed through the Hague. Colonel Sidney, uncle to the Earl of Sunderland, went to the Spa on pretence of only drinking the waters. The Lord Dunblain, (son to the Earl of Danby), and commander of an independent frigate, croffed and re-croffed the seas, to carry several dispatches and resolutions. The Earl of Stratburg mortgaged his estate for forty thousand pounds, and went over to the Prince to offer him both his purse and his sword. He was quickly followed by Admiral Herbert, his cousin Mr. Herbert, Mr. Ruffel, the Lord Mordaunt, and the Earl of Wiltshire. The principal persons with whom they held correspondence in England, were, the Earl of Danby, Devonshire, and Dorset, the Lords Lowelade and Delamere, the Duke of Norfolk, the Marquis of Halifax, his son the Lord Eland, the Marquis of Winchester, his son the Lord Pauler, the Lord Willoughby son to the Earl of Lindley, Mr. Lefter, Mr. Hampton, Mr. Peake, and many others, besides several eminent citizens of London (1).

The Prince of Orange being fully determined to head the party, it was, after several consultations, resolved, that the English Lords at the Hague should demand assistance of the States, in the name of all England. But to prevent the secret from being divulged, they applied at first only to persons of the greatest credit and influence, who promised to use all their interest, at a proper time, to promote the design. There was no need of many arguments to prevail with the States to assist the distressed English. They were equally concerned in the affair with the English themselves; for the ruin of Holland would doubtless have soon followed the slavery of England. Of this the designs of Lewis XIV. and his union with James II. (2), left no room to doubt. All the difficulty lay in making preparations, in concealing the design of them, in raising forces in the room of those which the Prince should lead into England, and in securing a timely relief, in case the King of France should attack Holland. But all these things were taken care of, with great address and secrecy. The difference at that time, about the election of an Archbishop of Cologne, between Prince Clement of Bavaria, and the Cardinal of Furstenberg, furnished the States with a pretence to assemble an army near Nimwegen. On the other hand, the Prince of Orange, by his intrigues, prevailed to have the direction of affairs then on the carpet, committed to the management of three or four members of the States, on pretence of the correspondents the Count d'Avoux the French Ambassador had in Holland, who might inform him of their resolutions. These commissioners, all in the Prince of Orange's confidence, under colour of the Cologne affair, gave orders for incamping an army, and preparing a fleet. At last, the Prince of Orange, on pretence of providing for a war against France, which seemed to be near, had an interview at Minden in Westphalia, with the Electors of Saxony, and Brandenburg, the Princes of the House of Lunenburg, and the Land-Grave of Hesse Cassel, and secured their assistance, in case France should attack Holland or the Low-Countries, while he was engaged in the English expedition. All this was transacted with such secrecy, that the Ambassadors of France and England, at the Hague, could get no certain intelligence. They were forced to recur to conjectures, though the first had usually been informed of the resolutions of the States, as soon as they were taken.

When the Prince of Orange had secured to the States, in case of need, the assistance of these Princes, he concerted his expedition with such prudence and secrecy, that his scheme was not known till after the execution; namely, that the States, under colour of being ready to support the election of the Prince of Bavaria, should form a camp on the Heath near Nimwegen, a place too remote from the sea, to give any suspicion that these troops were designed for an embarkation: That a fleet of fifty men of war should be prepared, with a sufficient number of transports, for the embarkation of twelve or thirteen thousand men. That, to prevent the alarm which these transports might give, the merchants of Amsterdam, Rotterdam, and other maritime places, should freight as many as they could on divers pretences: That these ships should repair to several ports, at a time assigned, to take the forces aboard, and afterwards to the Goree, where the men of war should expect them: That the Prince of Orange should put himself on board this fleet, and at his landing in England, the English persons of quality, by whom he was invited, should dispute themselves into divers parts of the Kingdom, to excite insurrections, and levy troops, while the Prince, with his little army, should make head against the King. It was not doubted, but the Prince's army would considerably increase when he should be in England, and the people in general be ready to second the efforts of those, who were labouring 1683. for their deliverance. This whole scheme was executed in the manner it had been resolved, without the Ambassadors of England and France being able to learn any thing certain. They conjectured, however, by the naval preparations, that something was secretly contriving against England. Indeed it was difficult to prepare four or five hundred transports, and fifty men of war so privately, that they should have no intelligence from their spies. The Count D'Avaux failed not to send his conjecures to the Court of France, which were immediately transmitted to England. Moreover, Mr. Skelton, King James's Envoy at the Hague, had before informed him of an intercepted letter, which intimated, that a great project was secretly carrying on against him. But the King was then so secure of success, that he neglected this intelligence, believing it only an artifice to divert him from his designs.

A little before, Mr. Budé de Verace, a Proteſtant of Geneva, Gentleman-Usher to the Prince of Orange, having been dismissed, was returned to his own country. When he heard of the great preparations in Holland, he writ to Mr. Skelton, then Envoy at Paris, that he had things to communicate to the King of England, that were of no less concern than his crown, but would not discover the secret to any but the King himself; and that if his Majesty would let him know his pleasure, he would immediately repair to London. Skelton was not wanting to give information to the Court of England, and to repeat it by five or six letters. But no notice was taken of it, whether through a too great security, or that the Earl of Sunderland, to whom the letters were addressed, did not think proper to communicate them to the King.

Mean while, as the armament in Holland could hardly be concealed any longer, and the King receiving repeated advices of it, he judged it convenient, at all events, to flatter the people with the expectation of a Parliament. So, the 24th of August, he declared in council his intention to call a Parliament for the 27th of November, and the Chancellor had orders to issue out the writs the 5th of September. However, the writs were not sent, which gave occasion to think, the King only designed to amuse the publick.

The next day, Mr. de Bonrepas arrived at London from Paris, and had several conferences with the King. It is pretended, that he offered him from the King of France a fleet, and an army of thirty thousand men, but that the Earl of Sunderland prevented the offer from being accepted. He is said to represent to the King, "That it would be very dangerous to introduce a foreign army into England, at the very time he was preparing to hold a Parliament: That he would entirely lose the hearts of his subjects, and even of those who were most devoted to him: That if the French should have a mind to render themselves masters of the Kingdom, he would find but very few who would join to deliver him from such troublesome guests, and that in accepting so powerful an aid, he would quickly become only a Viceroy to Lewis XIV." Some have pretended, that this advice was evident treachery in the Earl of Sunderland, who was gained by the Prince of Orange. But this accusation rests only upon the ill success of the King's affairs afterwards, and upon the supposition that he would have succeeded in his designs, had the King of France's offer been accepted. However, the King refused the aid, because he thought it unnecessary, and yet, it is pretended, that he made at this very time a new alliance with Lewis, but which was never published.

In the mean time, the King hearing from several parts, that an armament was making in Holland, he ordered the Marquis of Albionville, his Ambassador, to present a Memorial to the States, to demand what they meant by their warlike preparations, especially by sea, at that time of the year. The States answered, That they armed in imitation of his Britannick Majesty, and might with more reason demand an explanation about the alliance into which he was lately entered. This answer increasing the King's suspicions, he now began to take the necessary measures for putting himself in a posture of defence. With this view, he gave the governments of Portsmouth and Hull, the two keys of the Kingdom, to Papists, and took care to have the majority of the officers and soldiers of these garrisons of that Religion.

After all, he could not yet believe, the Prince of Orange would venture to attack him. He still relied on his fleet and army, though he had now had several demonstrations of their disaffection. The Court of France could not conceive the cause of so strange an indolence; nor was Skelton less puzzled to answer the question so often asked, why the King his master refused the assistance of France. He could only say, that he had no orders about it. At last, in a conference one day with Monsieur de Croissy upon this subject, he told him, it was his private opinion, that if France would threaten to attack the States-General, in case any thing was attempted by them against the King of England, such a declaration would break all the Prince of Orange's meaasures. The Court of France approving of this proposal, the Count D'Avaux presented a memorial to the States the 30th of August, declaring: "That all circumstances inclined the King, his master, to believe with reason, that the arming in Holland threatened England, therefore his Majesty had commanded him to declare to them, on his part, — That the ties of friendship and alliance between him and the King of Great Britain, would oblige him only to assist him, but also to look on the first act of hostility that should be committed by their troops or their fleet, against his Majesty of Great-Britain, to be a manifest rupture of the peace, and a breach with his Crown."

The States, after an ambiguous answer to this Memorial, demanded of the Marquis of Albionville, the meaning of the new alliance between the two Kings. The same demand was made to the Court of England by the States Ambassador, Van Citters, to whom they sent a copy of the memorial. Whereupon the King summoned a Council, and by the Earl of Sunderland's means it was resolved, to disown the proceedings of the Count D'Avaux. This resolution was immediately communicated to the Ambassador of the States, and to all the King's Ministers in foreign Courts. Moreover, to convince the publick, that the King was not concerned in the memorial presented by the Count d'Avaux, Skelton was recalled, and immediately sent to the Tower.

On this occasion, the Earl of Sunderland reasoned upon the same principle advanced by him, when the assistance offered by France was in debate. It cannot be denied, that his reasons appeared plausible to the King. But it is supposed by some, that the King was deceived, and that it was not possible for the Earl of Sunderland to be deceived also. Wherefore they ascribe his counsels to an express design of betraying his master. Those who talk thus, are, 'tis likely, very sorry, the King did not follow the contrary opinion, and embrace the offer of France. They are persuaded, in that case, the Prince of Orange's measures would have been disconcerted, his undertaking relinquished, and the King, with the assistance of thirty thousand men, been absolute master of his Kingdom. But it must be considered, that this is supposing an uncertain event; that the prime Minister's advice, preceded the King's disaster some months; and, to accuse him of an intention to betray the King, it must be supposed, that he could have foreseen what the King himself did not: In a word, that he was secretly engaged with the Prince of Orange, of which however there is no positive proof. The most plausible ground of suspicion against him, is, his admission into that Prince's council and confidence, when on the throne. But he was not the only Minister of King James, who was thus favoured by King William. It is however certain, though the Earl of Sunderland embraced the popish Religion, he was, and still is, suspected by the Papists. There are even Protestants, who owning that he betrayed his master, count this pretended treachery an honour to him, since it tended to the good of the Kingdom.

Though the King, as I said, had ordered Writs to be issued out for a new Parliament, the order had not been executed. This appears clearly in a Proclamation of the 21st of September, wherein the King supposed, the elections were not yet begun. It imported:

"That his Majesty having already signified his pleasure to call a Parliament, left those whose right it was to chuse members, should lie under any prejudice and mistakes, through the artifices of disaffected persons, he thought it fit to declare, that as it was his royal purpose to endeavour a legal establishment of an universal Liberty of Conscience for all his Subjects, it was also his resolution inviolably to preserve the Church of England, by such a confirmation of the several Acts of Uniformity, that they should never be altered any other ways than by repealing the several clauses, which inflict penalties upon Persons not promoted, or to be promoted to any ecclesiastical Benefices within the meaning of the said Acts, for exercising their Religion contrary to the purport of the said Acts of Uniformity. And that for the further securing, not only the Church of England, but the Protestant Religion in general, he was willing the Roman Catholics should remain incapable to be members of the House of Commons; whereby those fears and apprehensions would be removed, which many persons had had, That the legislative authority would be engrossed by them, and turned against Protestants."

This Proclamation was too obscure and ambiguous to produce any great effect. There was even a manifest contradiction in the design to repeal the penal laws, and at the same time to preserve the Acts of Uniformity. Besides the King spoke only of excluding Papists from the House of Commons, and not from that of the Lords. But what still more plainly discovered the King's intention to amuse the people, was, that the writs for a new Parliament were not issued.

1688. "speed, for calling of a free and regular Parliament, in which the Church of England might be secured according to the Acts of Uniformity: Provision might be made for a due Liberty of Conscience, and for securing the Liberties and Properties of all his Subjects, and a mutual confidence might be established between his Majesty and all his people."

"X. Above all, That his Majesty would be pleased to permit his Bishops, to offer such motives and arguments, as (they trusted) might, by God's Grace, be effectual to persuade his Majesty to return to the Communion of the Church of England, into whose most holy Catholic Faith he was baptized, in which he was educated, and to which, it was their daily earnest prayer to God, that he might be re-united."

These advices clearly shew, that what has hitherto been seen concerning King James's Government, is not grounded upon calumnies spread by his enemies. For how, on the 3d of October (a month before the Prince of Orange's arrival, and at a time when the events were yet uncertain) could these nine Bishops conspire together to reproach the King with a violation of the laws in all these articles, under colour of giving him counsel? Besides, these advices agree, for the most part, with the Prince of Orange's declaration, signed at the Hague, at the very time the Bishops were consulting together at London. In short, the King's proceedings two days after, invincibly prove the truth of these facts. So, the advocates for King James can only plead, either that he had a right to act as he did, or, though he had no such right, his Subjects were bound to submit to his will. But this is not the place to examine these questions.

The King perceiving that a refusal to comply with the advice of the Bishops, would only increase the people's jealousy, resolved, though probably with regret, to redress most of the grievances complained of. For this purpose, two days after, the Commission for Ecclesiastical causes was dissolved. The next day, the Lord-Chancellor had orders to carry back in person the Charter of London. The Lord-Lieutenants of the several counties were required to inform themselves of the abuses and irregularities committed in the late regulations of Corporations, in order to redress the same. The Bishop of Winchester, Visitor of Magdalen College in Oxford, was ordered to settle that society regularly, and according to their Statutes. A proclamation was issued out for restoring Corporations to their ancient Charters, Liberties, Rights, and Franchises. The Lord-Lieutenants were displaced in several counties. Popish Justices of the Peace, Mayors, Recorders, and other Magistrates, were removed, and Protestants put in their places. Thus, in the space of about twelve days, that formidable fabric was in effect, or in a great measure demolished, which the Romish cabal had spent near four years in erecting.

But all these proceedings were not capable to restore the King to the confidence of his Subjects, because they came too late, and seemed rather the effect of necessity than inclination. No other motive could be imagined of the King's destroying his own work, than his fear of being deferred on the arrival of the Prince of Orange, who was daily expected. Whence it was inferred, that the King's condescension would last no longer than the danger. What had been only suspected, was soon found to be true. The Bishop of Winchester, pursuant to the King's order, having caused a citation to be fixed on the gates of Magdalen College, to recal Dr. Hough, and the ejected Fellows of that Society, upon the news of the disposition of the Prince's fleet by a tempest, was recalled on some frivolous pretence, and the restoration of the College deferred. But afterwards, the news proving false, the King refused his pretended affection for the University, and the College was restored.

This extremely prejudiced the King, as it manifestly shewed, that in his late changes in favour of the Protestants, his aim had been only to amuse them, till he should be able to retract. Such as had fallen into the snare, and believed the King to have acted with sincerity, lost all their former confidence in him. So, James saw himself at once reduced to the assistance of his popish Subjects alone, who were incapable to restore his sinking affairs.

As all his hope was placed in his army, he applied himself, as far as lay in his power, to augment and strengthen it with troops, which should wholly depend on him. In obedience to orders already given, two thousand five hundred men landed at Chyster from Ireland, and three thousand Scots were advanced to Carlisle. Besides this, new commissions were granted (1), for levying ten regiments of Horse and Foot, not to mention several independent companies. All the Militia had orders to be in a readiness to march. Lastly, A Proclamation was published, commanding all horses, oxen, and cattle, to be driven and removed to the place at least of twenty miles, from the places where the enemy should attempt to land. This was all he could do. But it was not in his power to cause his Subjects to second him with affection, or his troops to serve him faithfully. Accordingly, it was not upon an army of thirteen or fourteen thousand men that the Prince of Orange relied, but upon the disposition of the English, who impatiently expected his arrival: Without this, so small an army would not have been capable of conquering England.

In the mean time, the populace of London growing insolent, by the hopes of the Prince's coming, began to insult the popish Chapels; wherefore the King ordered them to be shut up, for fear of an insurrection in so dangerous a juncture. On the other hand, many Romish Priests and Jesuits perceiving the gathering storm, and prefiguring nothing good from the disposition of the people, and the Court's consternation, began gradually to disappear, and to consult their own safety by a timely retreat into foreign parts.

In the midst of all these distractions, the King caused the Prince of Wales to be solemnly baptized; the Pope, represented by his Nuncio, being Godfather, and the Queen-Dowager Godmother. Father Saban officiated, and named him James-Francis-Edward.

At the same time the Court received a pamphlet, published in Holland, and entitled, A Memorial of the English Protestants, presented to their Highnesses, the Prince and Princess of Orange. It was ascribed to Dr. Burnet, or Major Wildman, wherein, after a long narrative of the grievances of the nation, the author complained of King James's obliging his Subjects to own a supposititious child for the Prince of Wales, adding, That his Majesty would never suffer the witnesses that were present at the Queen's delivery to be heard and examined. The King was no stranger to the suspicions entertained by the people on this account, but hitherto had pretended to be ignorant of, or at least to despise, them. He perceived, however, that on this occasion, he could not, without great prejudice to himself, help answering to publick a challenge. He therefore held an extraordinary Council the 22d of October, to which were called the Queen-Dowager, all the Lords spiritual and temporal then in town, the Lord-Mayor and Aldermen of London, the Judges, and several of his Majesty's learned Council. All these being assembled, the King told them,

"He had called them together upon a very extraordinary occasion; but that extraordinary diseases must have extraordinary remedies: That the malicious endeavours of his enemies had so poisoned the minds of some of his Subjects, that by the reports he had from all hands, he had reason to believe, that very many did not think this son, with which God had blessed him, to be his, but a supposed child. But, he might say, that by a particular Providence, scarce any Prince was ever born, where there were so many persons present. That he had taken this time to have the matter heard and examined there, expecting that the Prince of Orange, with the first easterly wind, would invade this Kingdom: And as he had often ventured his life for the nation before he came to the Crown, so he thought himself more obliged so to do now he was King, and did intend to go in person against him, whereby he might be exposed to accidents; and therefore he thought it necessary to have this now done, in order to satisfy the minds of his Subjects, and to prevent the Kingdom's being engaged in blood and confusion after his death: That he had desired the Queen Dowager to give herself the trouble to come hither, to declare what she knew of the birth of his son; and that most of the Ladies, Lords, and other persons who were present, were ready to depose upon oath their knowledge of the matter."

After this Speech, depositions were taken, first of the Queen-Dowager, who only said, That she was in the room when the Queen was delivered, without any thing more positive or particular. After her followed forty witnesses, of which seventeen were Papists, and it was begun with proving, that the Queen was brought to bed while many persons were in the room. To this tended the testimonies of the eighteen Lords who accompanied the King thither. This proof signified nothing, or was very ambiguous. It was well known, there were a great many persons in the room at the time the Queen was said to be delivered; which doubtless, was all that was meant by this proof. But it was not sufficient to prove the reality of the delivery. Some of the Ladies deposed, that they saw the child soon after in the arms of the midwife. But as no man in the council durst put any questions to the witnesses, concerning several circumstances, these general depositions were incapable to remove all suspicions. The midwife deposed positively, that she took the child from the Queen's body. The Countess 1688. of Sunderland depofed, that the Queen called her to give her her hand, that she might feel how the child lay, which, added ſhe, I did, but ſhe did not fay whether ſhe felt the child or not. The Biſhop of Salisbury adds, That the Counteſs of Sunderland told the Duchefs of Hamilton, (from whom he had this particular) that when the put her hand into the bed, the Queen held it, and let it go no lower than her breafte, ſo that really ſhe felt nothing. Many Ladies depofed, That they had often ſeen the marks of milk on the Queen's linnen near her breafte. Two or three depofed, That they ſaw it running out at the nipple. But what is remarkable, none of theſe Ladies named the time in which they ſaw the milk, except one, who named the month of May. Now if it be true, as was before related, that the Queen was really with child till the 9th of April, and that ſhe miſcarried that day, when all that was mentioned of milk in the Queen's breafte, particularly by her that fixed it to the month of May, might have followed upon that miſcarriage, and be no proof concerning the late birth. Mrs. Pierce the Laundreſs depofed, That ſhe took linnen from the Queen's body once, which carried the marks of a delivery. The Biſhop objects here, that it is ſtrange ſhe ſhould ſpeak only to one time. The Lady Wentworth was the ſingle witneſs that depofed, That ſhe had felt the child move in the Queen's belly, but ſhe fixed it to no time.

Remarks
upon the Depoſitions.

In general, ſee in few words the uſe that may be made of the ſuſpicions mentioned by ſeveral authors, and of theſe depoſitions, namely, There being three caſes, in none of which the two parties agree, the depoſitions are not applicable to any of the caſes, without being contradicted by thoſe who maintain one of the other two caſes. Let us take for inſtance, the two depoſitions, which, next to that of the midwife, appear moſt convincing, namely, That of the Lady who had ſeen milk run from the Queen's breafte; and that of the Lady Iſabella Wentworth, who had felt the child in the womb. Theſe two teſtimonies are ſufficient againſt thoſe who maintain, that the Queen was not with child from January, the time of her declared pregnancy, to the 10th of June, the time of her delivery. But they are inſufficient againſt thoſe who pretend that ſhe was really with child, from the 6th of October to the ninth of April, when ſhe had a miſcarriage, for the reaſons before-mentioned. To be able therefore to give a certain judgment concerning the birth of the Prince of Wales, it is neceſſary, 1. That facts ſhould be agreed in, I mean, whether it be true, that the Queen was really with child, and that ſhe had a miſcarriage. 2. That thoſe who derive their ſuſpicions from the Queen's obſtinate refusal to give ſatisfaction to the publick, ſhould fix the time of this obſtinacy to the interval between the 9th of April, the day of her pretended miſcarriage, and the 10th of June, the day of her delivery. For in ſuppoſing the reality of her pregnancy till Eaſter week, the ſuſpicions ariſing from the Queen's obſtinacy, cannot but be ill-grounded, unleſs this obſtinacy is confined to the ſpace of time, between the miſcarriage and the delivery, which it is not. 3. That the two Ladies who depofed concerning the milk and the motion of the child, ſhould have fixed the time to the ſame interval, otherwiſe their teſtimony proves nothing againſt thoſe who maintain, that the Queen was really with child till Eaſter week, and had then a miſcarriage; but this is what does not appear. As to the teſtimony of the midwife, which is the principal and moſt poſitive, all that can be objected to it, is, that it is a ſingle teſtimony, and that beſides the being a Papiſt, might have been corrupted. But this is only a conjecture, a bare poſſibility. It is therefore clear, that to decide this queſtion in a manner capable to ſatisfy thoſe who only ſeek the truth, a more perfect knowledge muſt be had of many circumſtances which as yet lie concealed.

part of the Depoſitions.

The King's precaution produced not the expected effect. The ſuſpicion of an impoſture was ſo deeply rooted in the minds of moſt of the Engliſh, that it was rather confirmed than removed by this examination. The myſterious conduct obſerved at a time when, conſidering the general ſuſpicion, all poſſible precautions ought to have been taken to render the birth unqueſtionable, made a ſtronger impreſſion than all theſe teſtimonies, and the rather, as they were found to be very defective. Before this examination the preſumption of law was for the Prince, ſince he was owned by both parents, ſo that the proof lay on the other ſide, and ought to be offered by thoſe who queſtioned it. But after the King had undertaken to prove the reality of his ſon's birth, by forty witneſſes, of which more than thirty ſaid nothing material, and the reſt fixed no time to what they depofed, he left room to his enemies to object againſt theſe very depoſitions.

The King's own teſtimony was not more effectual. After the witneſſes were examined, he told the aſſembly, “ That the Princeſs Anne of Denmark would have been preſent; but that ſhe being with child likewiſe, and having not lately ſtirred abroad, could not come ſo far “ without hazard.” Adding further, “ That tho' he did not queſtion but every perſon there preſent was ſatisfied before in this matter, yet by what they had heard, they would be better able to ſatisfy others: That beſides, if he and the Queen could be thought ſo wicked as to endeavour to impoſe a child upon the nation, they ſaw how impoſſible it would have been; neither could he himſelf be impoſed upon, having conſtantly been with the Queen during her being with child, and the whole time of her labour. That there was none of them but would eaſily believe him, who had ſuffered ſo much for Conſcience ſake, incapable of ſo great a villany, to the prejudice of his own children; and that he thanked God, that thoſe that knew him, knew well, that it was his principle to do as he would be done by, for that was the Law and the Prophets; and he would rather die a thouſand deaths, than do the leaſt wrong to any of his children.”

The reaſons alledged by the King in this Speech were far from being convincing, ſince thoſe who believed the impoſture, were perſuaded, that the King was chiefly concerned in it, notwithstanding all his averations, which were but little regarded. It is a ſad thing for a King not to be credited by the body of his Subjects. The depoſitions were ſolemnly enrolled in Chancery, and afterwards printed and diſperſed among the people. But this did not prevent a general belief, that the Prince of Wales was ſuppoſitious. So this birth remains hitherto in uncertainty, and probably, will long remain ſo. For it muſt be obſerved, that after the King and Queen had withdrawn into France, there was no finding either the midwife or the Queen's Ladies, who had depoſed the moſt material circumſtances of the pregnancy or the delivery.

The 28th of October, the Earl of Sunderland was ſuddenly removed from his places of Preſident of the Council, and principal Secretary of State. It is believed, that his neglect of Stelton's letters to him, was the principal cauſe of his diſgrace. He ſaid upon this ſubject, “ If he gave no account of theſe letters to the King, it was becauſe Stelton never wrote but ſecond-hand news.” But theſe were not mere letters of news. One Wickhead formerly a Monk, being ſeized for holding correſpondence with the King's enemies, charged the Earl of Sunderland to his face, with revealing his Majeſty's ſecrets to the Prince of Orange. But being committed to the cuſtody of a meſſenger, he made his eſcape the next day. However, it is certain, Sunderland had been ſome time ſuſpected by the Papiſts, who, in all appearance, perſuaded the King of his ſecret intelligence with the Prince of Orange. He publiſhed afterwards an apology, but the diſcuſſion of this affair would be too great a digreſſion.

As the Prince of Orange was expected with the firſt eaſt-erly wind, ſome of the moſt devoted to the King during his proſperity, thought proper to ſecure themſelves by Letters of Pardon for their illegal actions. Amongſt theſe were the moſt famous Chancellors J. J. Effertis, Sir Nicholas Butler, the Biſhop of Chyſter, the Biſhop of Durham, and about twenty more, to whom the King readily granted the favour they deſired.

While theſe things were tranſacting in England, the neceſſary diſpoſitions were making in Holland for the aſſiſtance of the Engliſh. For it was upon this foot that the States let their troops to the Prince of Orange; and what the King called in England an invaſion, in Holland was termed, a brotherly aſſiſtance lent by the States and the Prince to the diſtreſſed Engliſh. It can hardly be thought, that the Prince of Orange, with an army of thirteen or fourteen thouſand men, would have undertaken a deſcent into England, had he not been aſſured of a favorable reception from the generality of the people. But as it was neceſſary to remove the ſuſpicion fomented by the King, that the Prince was coming to conquer and ſubdue England, he thought proper, in a Declaration, to ſhow the true motives of his undertaking. This Declaration dated the 10th of October, New Style, was divided into twenty-fix articles, reducible to theſe three general heads:

“ The firſt contained a particular enumeration of the Grievances of the Engliſh nation, eſpecially the King's arrogating to himſelf a diſpenſing Power: His advancing Papiſts to civil, eccleſiaſtical, and military employments, and allowing them to fit in the Privy-Council: His ſetting up an illegal Commiſſion for eccleſiaſtical affairs, in which there was one of his Miniſters of State, who made publick profeſſion of the popiſh Religion, and who at the time of his firſt profeſſing it, declared, That for a great while before, he had believed that to be the only true Religion; and by which not only the Biſhop of London was ſuſpended, but the Preſident and Fellows of Magdalen College arbitrarily turned out of their freeholds, contrary to that expreſs provision in Magna Charta, That no man ſhall loſe his life or goods but by the laws of the land: His allowing popiſh Monafteries and Colleges of Jeſuits to be created: His turning out of publick employments,

"ments, all such as would not concur with him in the repeal of the Test and Penal Laws: His invading the Privileges, and seizing on the Charters of most Corporations, and placing popish Magistrates in some of them: His subjecting the Courts of Judicatory to his arbitrary and despotick power, and putting the administration of justice into the hands of Papists: His not only arming the Papists, in contempt of the laws, but likewise raising them up to the greatest military trusts, both by sea and land, strangers as well as natives, and Irish as well as English, that he might be in a capacity to enslave the nation: His putting the whole Government of Ireland into the hands of Papists: His assuming an absolute and arbitrary power in the Kingdom of Scotland; from which it was apparent, what was to be looked for in England."

Secondly, His Highness alledged, "That those great and insufferable oppressions, and the open contempt of all law, together with the apprehension of the sad consequences that must certainly follow upon it, had made the Subjects to look after such remedies as are allowed of in all nations, and in the most absolute Monarchies, all which had been without effect; his Majesty's evil counsellors having endeavoured to make all men apprehend the loss of their lives, liberties, honours, and estates, if they should go about to preserve themselves from this oppression, by Petitions, and Representations; an instance of which was, the prosecution of the seven Bishops: That a Peer of the realm (the Lord Levelace) was treated as a criminal, only because he said, That the Subjects were not bound to obey the orders of a popish Justice of Peace; though it is evident, that they being by law rendered incapable of all such trusts, no regard is due to their orders: That both he and his Consort the Princess, had endeavoured to signify, with terms full of respect, to the King, the just and deep regret, which all these proceedings had given them, and declared what their thoughts were, touching the repealing of the Test and Penal Laws; but that these evil Counsellors had put such ill constructions on their good intentions, that they had endeavoured to alienate the King more and more from them. That the last and great remedy for all these evils, was, the calling of a Parliament, which could not yet be compassed, nor could be easily brought about: for those men apprehending that a lawful Parliament would bring them to account for all their open violations of law, and for their conspiracies against the Protestant Religion, and the lives and liberties of the Subjects, they had endeavoured, under the specious pretence of Liberty of Conscience, first to sow divisions between those of the Church of England, and Dissenters, with design to engage Protestants, who are equally concerned to preserve themselves from popish oppression, into mutual quarrellings; that so by these, some advantage might be given them to bring about their designs; and that both in the elections of members of Parliament, and afterwards in the Parliament itself: That they had also made such regulations, as they thought fit and necessary, for securing all the members that were to be chosen by the Corporations; by which means they hoped to avoid the punishment they deserved, though it was apparent, that all acts, made by popish Magistrates, were null and void of themselves: So that no Parliament could be lawful, for which the elections and returns were made by popish Magistrates, Sheriffs, and Mayors of towns; and therefore as long as the magistracy was in such hands, it was not possible to have a free Parliament legally called and chosen. That there were great and violent presumptions, inducing his Highness to believe, that those evil counsellors, in order to the gaining the more time for the effecting their ill designs, had published, That the Queen had brought forth a son; though there had appeared, both during the Queen's pretended bigness, and in the manner wherein the birth was managed, so many just and visible grounds of suspicion, that not only he himself, but all the good Subjects of the Kingdom, did vehemently suspect, That the pretended Prince of Wales was not born of the Queen; And tho' many both doubted of the Queen's bigness, and of the birth of the child, yet there was not any thing done to satisfy them, or put an end to their doubts. That since his Consort the Princess, and likewise he himself, had so great an interest in this matter, and such a right, as all the world knew, to the succession of the Crown; since all the English did in the year 1672, when Holland was invaded with a most unjust war, use their utmost endeavours to put an end to that war, and that in opposition to those who were then in the Government; since the English nation had ever testified a most particular affection and esteem, both to his Highness's dearest Consort, and to himself, he could not excuse himself from espousing that interest, in a matter of such high consequence, and for contributing all that in him lay, for the maintaining both of the Protestant Religion,

"and the laws and liberties of these Kingdoms: To the doing of which, his Highness was most earnestly solicited by a great many Lords, both Spiritual and Temporal, and by many Gentlemen, and other Subjects of all ranks."

In the last place his Highness declared, "That for the forementioned reasons, he has thought fit to go over to England, and to carry with him a force sufficient to defend him from the violence of those evil Counsellors: That his expedition was intended for no other design, but to have a free and lawful Parliament, assembled as soon as it was possible; and that in order to this, all the late Charters, by which the elections of Burgesses are limited, contrary to the ancient custom, should be considered as null and of no force: That to this Parliament he would refer the enquiry into the birth of the pretended Prince of Wales, and of all things relating thereto, and to the right of succession: That he would concur in every thing that might procure the peace and happiness of the nation, under a just and legal Government: That he would keep the forces under his command, under all the strictness of martial discipline, and promised, that he would send back all those foreign forces, as soon as the state of the nation would admit of it: That therefore he invited and required all persons whatsoever to come and assist him, in order to the executing his designs against all such as shall endeavour to oppose him: That he would likewise take care, that a Parliament should be called in Scotland, for restoring the ancient constitution of that Kingdom, and for bringing the matters of Religion to such a settlement, that the people might live easy and happy: That he would also study to bring the Kingdom of Ireland to such a state, that the settlement there might be religiously observed, and that the Protestant and British interest there might be secured."

This declaration being printed, and ready to be sent over to England to be dispersed among the people, the Prince was informed, that the King, by the advice of the Bishops, had redressed several grievances mentioned in his declaration. Wherefore he thought fit to make the following addition to it.

"After we had printed our declaration, we have understood, that the subverters of the Religion and Laws of these Kingdoms, hearing of our preparations to assist the people against them, have begun to retract some of the arbitrary and despotick power that they had assumed, and to vacate some of their unjust judgments and decrees: The sense of their guilt, and the distrust of their force, have induced them to offer to the city of London some seeming relief from their great oppressions; hoping thereby, to quiet the people, and to divert them from demanding a re-establishment of their Religion and Laws, under the shelter of our arms: They did also give out, That we do intend to conquer and enslave the nation; and therefore it is, we have thought fit to add a few words to our declaration.

"We are confident, that no persons can have such hard thoughts of us, as to imagine, we have any other design in this our undertaking, than to procure a settlement of the Religion, and of the Liberties and Properties of the subject, upon so sure a foundation, that there may be no danger of the nation's relapsing into the like miseries at any time hereafter. And as the forces we have brought along with us are utterly disproportioned to that wicked design of conquering the nation, if we were capable of intending it; so the great numbers of the principal Nobility and Gentry, that are men of eminent quality and estates, and persons of known integrity and zeal, both for the Religion and Government of England; many of them being also distinguished by their constant fidelity to the Crown, who do both accompany us in this expedition, and have earnestly solicited us to it, will cover us from all such malicious insinuations: For it is not to be imagined, that either those who invited us, or those who are already come to assist us, can join in a wicked attempt of Conquest, to make void their own lawful titles to their honours, estates, and interests. We are also confident, that all men feel how little weight there is to be laid on all promises and engagements that can be now made, since there has been so little regard had in the time past, to the most SOLEMN PROMISES. And as that imperfect redress, that is now offered, is a plain confession of those violences of the Government, that we have set forth; so the defectiveness of it is no less apparent; for they lay down nothing which they take up at pleasure, and they reserve entire, and not so much as mention, their claims and pretences to an arbitrary and despotick power, which has been the root of all their oppression, and the total subversion of the Government. And it is plain, that there can be no redress, no remedy offered but in Parliament, by a declaration of the rights of the subjects that have been invaded, and not by any pretended acts of grace,

1688. "grace, to which the extremity of their affairs have driven them. Therefore it is that we have thought fit to declare, that we will refer all to a free assembly of this nation, in a lawful Parliament."

About the same time was published, The resolution of the States-General, containing the reasons that had obliged them to assist his Highness the Prince of Orange with ships, men, and ammunition, in his intended expedition into England.

The two principal reasons were: 1. That the Prince of Orange had been invited to this expedition by the English Nobility, Gentry, and Clergy: 2. That the States had just cause to fear, that in case the King of England became absolute in his own Kingdom, he would, in conjunction with the King of France, endeavour to bring their State to confusion, and, if possible, totally to subject it. This fear was founded upon the Earl of Castlemain's pressing the Pope, and the Patron Cardinal Gibo, (during his embassy at Rome) to admit his master to mediate a reconciliation between the Courts of Rome and Versailles, assuring, When that reconciliation was brought about, the two Kings would effectually serve the cause of the Church, and begin with the destruction of Holland. The Pope, to whom such projects were not agreeable, informed the Emperor of it, who communicated it to the Prince of Orange. This is at least what Dr. Burnet says in one of his letters.

Everything being ready for the projected expedition, the Prince of Orange went into the assembly of the States-General the 16th of October, to take a solemn leave of them. This was done in so tender and moving a manner, that both himself and the States melted into tears. He embarked the 10th of October, on a frigate of about thirty guns. The fleet consisted of fifty men of war, twenty five frigates, as many fire ships, with near four hundred victuallers, and other vessels, for the transportation of above four thousand Horse, and ten thousand Foot. The most considerable of the English, who accompanied the Prince, were, the Earls of Shrewsbury and Macclesfield, the Lords Mordaunt, Wiltshire, Paulet, Elan, Dunblain, Admiral Herbert, Mr. Herbert, Colonel Sidney, Mr. Russell, Sir Rowland Guin, Major Wildman, Dr. Burnet, Mr. Harbord, Mr. Ferguson, and many others less known. The Prince had with him, besides the general officers of the Dutch forces, Count Schomberg Marshal of France, who had last served the Elector of Brandenburg, Count Charles his son, Monsieur Caillermé, younger son to the Marquis of Rouvigny, and about three hundred French officers, who had left their country for their Religion. Admiral Herbert led the van of the fleet, Vice-Admiral Evertzen brought up the rear, and the Prince placed himself in the main body, carrying a flag with English colours, and their Highnesses arms surrounded with this Motto, THE PROTESTANT RELIGION AND LIBERTIES OF ENGLAND; and underneath, the Motto of the House of Nassau, JE MAINTIENDRAI, i. e. I will maintain.

This numerous fleet had been but few hours under sail, when suddenly the wind coming more westerly, there arose such a storm, that in less than two hours the whole fleet was so dispersed, that the next day scarce two Ships could be seen together. The storm continued two days, during which time, the ships endeavoured to gain, some one port, some another. Many were driven northward, and could not reach the appointed rendezvous till eight days after. Nevertheless, the damage was so inconsiderable, that there was properly only loss of time. But on this occasion, the States made use of an artifice, which did the King great prejudice; they ordered the Harlem and Amsterdam Gazettes to aggravate the damage sustained by the fleet, and to insinuate, that the Prince could not possibly be in a condition to pursue his design till the next spring (1). This was intended to amuse the Court of England, and make them more remiss in their preparations. But besides this advantage, they received from this artifice another still more considerable, which was, that the King, hearing the news with great pleasure, flattered himself, that he had now nothing more to fear, and that before the spring, he should infallibly be able to break all the Prince of Orange's measures. In this belief, he revoked some of his acts of grace granted to his subjects, and thereby clearly shewed, that these acts were extorted by necessity, and that consequently, no change was to be expected in his conduct for the future.

It was in this critical juncture that Captain Langham, an Englishman in the service of the States, was seized on his arrival in England. In his Portmanteau were found many copies of the Prince's declaration, which were sent to Court. The King having read the declaration, was surprized at that expression, That the Prince was most earnestly invited over by divers of the Lords, both Spiritual and Temporal, and by many Gentlemen, and others. Immediately he sent for the Archbishop, and four or five Bishops then in London, 1688. and demanded of them, Whether the contents of the Prince's declaration, relating to their inviting him over, were true? The Bishops contented themselves with promising in general, their faithful allegiance to his Majesty. But the King, little satisfied with this answer, required them to justify themselves to the world, as to their part in that invitation. At the same time he fixed a day, whereon he obliged them to present a paper under their own hand, signifying their abhorrence of the Prince of Orange's intended invasion. He farther let them know, "That a declaration was then in the press against the Prince of Orange, and was only deferred, to have their Paper of Abhorrence put into it."

On the day appointed, the Bishops repaired to Whitehall, and as soon as they were in the King's presence he called for their paper. But with all submission, "They begged to be excused from writing any thing of that nature, and for making a particular defence to a general accusation, lest they should give the first precedent of that kind against the privilege of Peers: Besides, that their profession being to promote peace, they thought it belonged not to them to declare war, especially against a Prince so nearly allied to the Crown." This answer threw the King into a violent rage. However they persisted in their refusal, in as dutiful terms as possible. The King not being able to prevail with them, ordered them to withdraw, with great indignation. They were afterwards informed, that one of the principal Members of the Council and Jesuit party, advised the King, To imprison them all, and extort the truth from them by violence.

Mean time, the King being desirous to conceal the Prince of Orange's Declaration from the people, forbade the publishing and dispersing it, by proclamation. But being afterwards informed, that a great number of copies were handed about the Kingdom, and sensible that his prohibition would be to no purpose, he chose to print the Declaration with remarks, tending to justify his own, and render odious the Prince of Orange's, conduct.

About the same time was printed a letter from the Prince of Orange, to the officers of the English army, and another from Admiral Herbert to the English Fleet. The design of these two letters was the same, namely to inform the army and the fleet of the true intentions of the Prince, and to represent to them, that in being the King's instruments to accomplish his designs, they were labouring their own ruin. Wherefore the officers, soldiers, and sailors, were conjured not to suffer themselves to be abused by a false notion of honour, to serve the King, contrary to the manifest interest of their Religion and Country. These two letters had a wonderful effect upon officers, soldiers and seamen; so that from this time many of them resolved not to draw their swords in this quarrel, till they had a free Parliament to secure their Religion and Liberties.

The King's fleet consisted of sixty-one men of war, of which thirty eight were of the line of battle. Several English authors venture to affirm, this fleet was more than sufficient to defeat that of the States. I know not upon what their assertion is grounded: But it seems to me, it is full as likely, that in case the fleets had engaged, the King's would have shared the danger. While the English fleet lay at anchor at the Gunfleet, the Lord Dartmouth, the Admiral, called a Council of war, wherein it was debated, whether it was proper to put to sea, and engage the enemy? An author who has writ the naval Transactions of the English, says on this occasion, "That this proposal carried the greatest weight with it, had there been a real design of obstructing the Prince of Orange in his passage to England. But instead of that, (continues he) matters were so concerted and agreed among the flag-officers and commanders, that had the Admiral come fairly up with the Dutch, it would not have been in his power to have done them much damage." Wherefore, by a great majority it was resolved to continue there, in order to intercept the Dutch fleet.

The damage sustained by the Prince's fleet in the late storm was so inconsiderable, and so easily repaired, that in eleven days it was in condition to put to sea again. The first of November, in the afternoon, the Prince embarked on a new vessel called the Brill, and the fleet at first steering northward, it was thought the design was to land somewhere in the north of England, and Burnet says, the first scheme was to anchor in the mouth of the Humber. But during the night, whether the Prince had changed his mind, or was hindered from pursuing this course by a violent East wind, all the fleet steered towards the Eastern Coasts of England; after which they shortened sail for fear of accidents in the night. The next morning the fleet sailed towards the Channel, without meeting any English ship, and in their passage discovered the coasts of Essex and

(1) In the Gazette, That the Prince had lost most of his fleet. But Burnet says, that he lost only four hundred ships. See also Burnet's Letters, p. 156.

"peru and Slavery. And whereas we are engaged in this "cause, by which means his person is exposed to danger,
"and to the cursed attempts of Papists, and other bloody "men; we do therefore solemnly engage to God, and to "one another, that if any such attempt be made upon him,
"we will pursue not only those that make it, but all their "adherents, and all that we find in arms against us, with "the utmost severity of a just revenge, to their utter ruin
"and destruction; and that the execution of any such "attempts (which God of his infinite mercy forbid) shall "not divert us from prosecuting this cause which we do
"now undertake, but that it shall engage us to carry it on
"with all the rigour that so barbarous an attempt shall de"serve."

From this time the face of the Prince of Orange's affairs, who left Exeter to march to Salisbury, was entirely changed.
Every day brought him persons distinguished by their birth, estates, or employments. The Lord Colchester, son to Earl Rivers, a Lieutenant in the Life-guards, waited upon the Prince, accompanied by Mr. Wharton, Colonel Godfrey, John Howe Esq; four Life-guard men, and about threecore men more on horseback. These were followed by the Earl of Abington, Captain Clarges, Mr. Russell, and others. But what was more material, the Lord Cornbury, son to the Earl of Clarendon, Colonel of Dragoons, leaving Salisbury, under pretence of an order from the King, to beat up one of the enemies advanced posts [at Hinton,] carried with him his own regiment, and those of Horse of Berwick, St Albans, and Fenwick, and with the major part of them went over to the Prince at Exeter.

About the same time the Lord Delamere took arms in Cheshire, and declared openly for the Prince, inviting all his tenants to follow his example. The Lord Lovelace was also marching to Exeter, with sixty or seventy horsemen, but passing through Cirencester, was made prisoner, by the Militia of the County, after a warm skirmish, in which ten or twelve men were killed on both sides.

On the other hand, the two Archbishops, five Bishops, the Dukes of Grafton and Ormond, the Earls of Dorset, Clare, Clarendon, Burlington, Anglesey, Rochester, the Lords Newport, Paget, Chandos, Ossington, meeting together in London, drew up a petition, which was signed at the Bishop of Rochester's house at Westminster. The intent of it was, to pray the King to call a free Parliament, and find some expedient to satisfy the Prince of Orange. The petition being delivered, and afterwards printed by the Lords for their own vindication, this answer was returned from the King, which was also published, My Lords, What you ask of me, I most passionately desire; and I promise upon the faith of a King, That I will have a Parliament, and such an one as you ask for, as soon as ever the Prince of Orange has quitted this realm: For how is it possible a Parliament should be free in all its circumstances, as you petition for, while an enemy is in the Kingdom, and can make a return of near a hundred voices? This answer was not satisfactory to the Lords, who easily saw, that the King was far from desiring a free Parliament, nor would have any but of which he could be master.

Though the King still put on a face of assurance, the defections in his army made him very uneasy. He knew not what to resolve, in the fear of some conspiracy among the officers to deliver him to the Prince of Orange, if he should put himself at the head of the army. This was the reason of his stopping the march of his forces, artillery, and his own equipage. But in a Council held on this occasion, it was judged necessary for him to be as soon as possible with his army, in order to keep those firm to their duty who were yet unresolved. He therefore departed the 17th of November, after having recommended the care of the city to the Lord-Mayor, and in a speech to the officers about him, renewed his promise of calling a Parliament as soon as the Prince of Orange had quitted the Kingdom. He told them, if they desired any thing more, he was ready to grant it; but that if, after all, any of them was desirous to go over to the Prince of Orange, he was willing to grant them passage, and spare them the shame of deserting their lawful Sovereign.
But at the very time he seemed disposed to give a general satisfaction, he left at Whitehall, a Council composed of five Lords, all odious to the people, except the Lord Godolphin.
The other four were, the Chancellor Jefferies, the Lords
Arundel and Bellasis, both known Papists; and the Lord Preston, suspected of favouring Popery. It is said, the King designed to leave there also his Confessor Father Petre, but the Jesuit chose rather to retire to France.

The King arrived the 19th of November at Salisbury, where the officers of his army, who were most devoted to him, paid him their compliments, and expressed an abhor-rence of Lord Cornbury's defection. At his arrival he was seized with a bleeding at the nose, which increased the next day, as he was going to view part of his army, quartered eight miles from Salisbury. On the same, or the following day, in it, the Earl of Feversham, General, desiring him to attend the King, "That upon any occasion they should be ready to "spill the last drop of their blood in his service; but yet

"they could not in conscience fight against a Prince, who "was come over with no other design, than to procure "the calling of a free Parliament, for the securing of their "Religion and Liberties." This Declaration, at which the King was extremely surprized, showed him, that his army, which had been always his principal refuge, could not be relied on. The Earl of Feversham, strongly suspecting the Lord Churchill (afterwards Duke of Marlborough) one of the King's favorites, Lieutenant-General, Captain of a troop of his Life-guards, and Gentleman of his Bed-Chamber, was very earnest with the King to have him secured. But the King, whether he had no such suspicion, or feared it would occasion a mutiny, would not follow his advice. However, the very next day the Lord Churchill went over to the Prince of Orange, accompanied by the Duke of Grafton, Colonel Berkley, four or five Captains of his own regiment, and some other officers. Father Orlam insinuates, that he had formed a design to deliver the King to the Prince of Orange, which was prevented by his Majesty's bleeding at the nose, at the time he intended to go and view his troops at Warrington, the most advanced Post of his army. But this accusation is groundless, and entirely destroyed by the respectful letter written by that Lord to the King, and which I therefore think proper to insert here.

This letter is a clear evidence, that nothing was farther from the Lord Churchill's thoughts, than to deliver the King to the Prince of Orange.

The Lord Churchill's defection quite sunk the King's spirits, who from this time saw not on whom he could rely. So, no longer daring to venture his person with his army, he left Salisbury, and returned to London with a precipitation like a flight. Before his departure, he publishes a proclamation, "Promising a free and absolute par"don to all his subjects, who had taken up arms, and joined "with the Prince of Orange, provided they quitted and de"serted him within the space of twenty days." But this proclamation had no effect. In his return, he met with a greater mortification, in the defection of the Prince of Denmark his Son-in-law, who leaving him at Andover, went off to the Prince of Orange, with the Duke of Ormond, Sir George Heuts, and others. That Prince wrote a very respectful letter to the King, in vindication of his conduct, wherein he grounds his defection chiefly on his concern for the Protestant Religion, which the King had openly attempted to destroy, not only in England, but all Europe, by his strict union with France.

1688. Prince would have ventured a battle, but on the King's advancing, would probably have retired to Bristol, in expectation of a more general defection in the King's army. Such a defection was justly expected, according to all the advices of those who came to join him. Wherefore, it is very unlikely that he would have risked an advantage, of which he was almost assured, by a battle, the success whereof would have been doubtful. I remember a report then in the Prince's army, that the Marshall de Schomberg being told, the King was advancing to give battle, the Marshall coldly answered, If we think proper. But upon hearing that the King was returned to London, and his army retired to Reading, the Prince marched to Salisbury, and made a public entry into that City, amidst the acclamations of the people. During his march, there was a small skirmish between two parties of the armies, in which that of the Prince, though very inferior in number, defended themselves with so much bravery, that the enemy had no reason to boast of the advantage, the loss being almost equal on both sides (1).

The defection of his principal officers was not the only cause of the King's mortal fears. Scarce a day passed, but what brought him some disagreeable news from different parts of the Kingdom. The Earl of Bath had made himself master of Plimouth, where the Dutch fleet lay secure. The Earl of Shrewsbury, and Sir John Guise had, with the assistance of the inhabitants, forced the Duke of Beaufort to surrender the important city of Bristol. The Earl of Derbyshire, at the head of a great number of Derbyshire Gentlemen, had declared for a free Parliament, agreeably to the Prince's declaration. The Earl of Danby had secured York, and having disarmed and turned out all the Papists, (who, under the protection of the Duke of Newcastle, stood up for the King) declared for a free Parliament. The town of Berwick soon followed the example of York, and the Gentlemen of Nottinghamshire had done the same. Colonel Copley, Deputy-Governor of Hull, surprized that town, and made the Lord Langdale, the popish Governor, prisoner. The Duke of Somerset and the Earl of Oxford, came to offer their service to the Prince of Orange. The Duke of Ormond entered Oxford without resistance, and caused the Prince's declaration to be read there. In fine, the King heard, that five commissioners from Scotland, among whom were the Duke of Queenbury, and the Lord of Belcarvis, were coming to London, to demand a free Parliament in that Kingdom. But the King's greatest affliction was, to see himself forsaken by his own daughter, the Princess of Denmark, who had privately withdrawn from Whitehall, being attended by the Bishop of London, mounted and armed, and retired to Nottingham, from whence she was conducted to the Prince her husband at Oxford. Some days before, it was reported, that the Queen had treated her very rudely, and proceeded so far as to strike her. This so incensed the people, that as soon as they found she appeared not at Whitehall, they offered to tear all the Romish party in pieces, upon a rumour of her being murdered, or confined, but on the news of her being in safety they were appeased. At her going off, she writ the following letter to the Queen.

The Princess of Denmark's Letter to the Queen.
 "MADAM, I beg your pardon, if I am so deeply afflicted with the surprizing news of the Prince's being gone, as not to be able to see you, but to leave this paper to express my humble duty to the King and your self; and to let you know that I am gone to absent my self, to avoid the King's displeasure, which I am not able to bear, either against the Prince or my self; and I shall stay at so great a distance, as not to return before I hear the happy news of a reconciliation. And as I am confident the Prince did not leave the King with any other design, than to use all possible means for his preservation; so I hope, you will do me the justice to believe, that I am not capable of following him for any other end. Never was any one in such an unhappy condition, so divided between duty and affection to a father and a husband; therefore I know not what to do, but to follow one to preserve the other. I see the general falling-off of the Nobility and Gentry, who avow to have no other end, than to prevail with the King to secure their Religion, which they saw so much in danger, by the violent counsels of the Priests; who, to promote their own Religion, did not care to what danger they exposed the King. I am fully persuaded, that the Prince of Orange designs the King's safety and preservation, and hope all things may be composed without more bloodshed, by calling of a Parliament. God grant a happy end to these troubles, that the King's reign may be prosperous, and that I may shortly meet you in perfect peace and safety: Till when, let me beg you to continue the same favorable opinion that you hitherto had of,

From what has been said it appears, that the defection was almost universal, and not confined to the Court and the Army. It is inconceivable, that the King should not have foreseen it, or should have so ill an opinion of the English, as to think, they would quietly suffer their Laws and Religion to be destroyed: That he should imagine, the giving a man a commission in his army, and obliging him to take the oath of allegiance, should free him from, or at least, make him forget his duty to God and his country. But it must be remembered, what the Princess of Denmark insinuated to the Queen, that the King's Counsellors cared not to what danger they exposed him. In making him the instrument to execute their designs, they no farther regarded his person, than as it served to elabish their Religion, in which they could not succeed without rendering him absolute, and James imprudently fell into the snare. Herein may be observed, the difference between Charles II. and James II. The first was always sensible, that the zealous promoters of absolute power intended his grandeur, only as a means to accomplish other projects. Wherefore, when he saw himself engaged in very dangerous courses, he forsook them as well as he could, and left his Counsellors, his Ministers, and even his own Brother in the danger. This was his frequent practice, and he thereby bequeathed to the Duke his brother, the difficulty and peril of a contrary method. But James II., in pursuing a directly opposite course to that of Charles, gave himself up entirely to the counsels of those, who, to attain their own ends, regarded not to what danger they exposed him, by their violent proceedings.

Be this as it will, the King, at the time I am speaking of, was plunged in a gulph of difficulties, without perceiving any way to escape. The Queen was dismayed, and her consternation inexpressible. Father Petre was retired into France, under the protection of the Lord Walgrave, sent thither in the room of Skelton. The violent counsels of Jesseries were now unseasonable. The popish counsellors seeing all their measures broken, took care to shelter themselves from the impending storm, to which they left the King exposed. In short, Mr. Barillon the French Ambassador, and Monsieur de Lausun, then in London, vented themselves in fruitless reproaches on the King, for refusing the assistance offered by France, without directing him how to repair that error. In this extreme distress (more easily to be imagined than described) his sole refuge was to turn to the Protestant Peers, whose counsels he had before rejected, whom he had deprived of their employments, and in a word, treated as enemies. He therefore assembled all the Peers, Spiritual and Temporal, that were in London. The number indeed was but small, there being many with the Prince of Orange, or in several parts of the Kingdom, for his service. When they were met, he prayed for their advice concerning the present emergencies. On this occasion, he had the mortification to hear a long enumeration of all his unwarrantable proceedings, since his accession to the throne, and particularly his violent measures to destroy the Protestant Religion, and subvert the Liberties of England. These, it was said, had occasioned the dangerous symptoms that now appeared in the body politic, and for which there was no other remedy than a free Parliament. The necessity therefore was represented to his Majesty, 1. Of granting a general pardon to all those who either came over with the Prince of Orange, or had joined him since his landing; 2. Of deputed some Lords to his Highness, to treat with him about a suspension of arms, and to endeavour to bring matters to an accommodation. And lastly, of turning all Papists immediately out of their employments; to convince the world, that his Majesty acted with sincerity.

The King took that night to consider of the advice, and the next day declared in Council, that he was resolved to call a free Parliament, that should meet the 15th of January next ensuing. Accordingly, the Chancellor was ordered to issue out the Writs. Then he published a Proclamation in which he declared, that all his subjects should have free liberty to elect, and all the Peers, and such as should be elected members of the House of Commons, should have full liberty and freedom to serve and sit in Parliament, notwithstanding they had taken up arms, or committed any act of hostility, or been any way aiding or assisting therein. He likewise declared in Council his intention of sending Commissioners to treat with the Prince of Orange: but as to that part of the advice relating to the Roman Catholics, his Majesty only said, He would leave that matter to be debated in Parliament. However, Sir Edward Hales, a Papist and Lieutenant of the Tower, having been obnoxious to the city of London, by threatening Commissioners The Commissioners nominated by the King to meet with the Prince of Orange, were the Marquis of Halifax, the Earl of Nottingham, and the Lord Godolphin. They left London the 2d of December, and on their way met with palles from the Prince.

At the same time appeared a printed paper at London and other places, called, The Third Declaration of the Prince of Orange, dated the 28th of November. It was penn'd by a private, and fill unknown hand, who had the boldness to put the Prince's name to it, and disperse it thro' the Kingdom (1). Amongst other things he made the Prince say, That as he would offer no violence to any but in his own necessary defence, so he would not suffer any injury to be done to the person, even of any Papist, provided he was found in such place, and condition, and circumstance, as the law required. But he declared, that all Papists, who should be found in open arms, or in any office civil or military, contrary to the known laws of the land, should be treated by him and his forces, not as Gentlemen and Soldiers, but as Robbers, Free-booters, and Banditti's; so should all persons found any ways aiding or assisting to them: That whereas he was certainly informed, that great numbers of armed Papists had of late resorted to London and Westminster, and parts adjacent, not so much, he had reason to suspect, for their own security, as out of a wicked design to make some desperate attempt upon the said cities and their inhabitants, he therefore required all magistrates and officers, civil and military, to disarm and secure them, that all power of doing mischief might be taken from them: That those magistrates or others, who should refuse to assist him, to execute vigorously what he required of them, should be esteemed the most criminal and infamous of all men; betrayers of their Religion, Laws, and Country, of whom he would require the life of every single Protestant that should perish, and every house that should be burnt or destroyed, by their treachery and cowardice.

This Declaration, published in the Prince's name, though it was disowned by him, finished the confusion of the Papists; and the more, as several justices of peace caused it to be published, not imagining that any private man would have had the boldness to undertake such a thing. From this time the Popish party were reduced so low, that they durst not hold up their heads. An Hue and Cry after Father Petre, was publicly cryed and fold in the streets, notwithstanding he was a Privy-Counsellor. A legal Accusation against the Earl of Salisbury, "For infringing the most sacred Laws of the Kingdom by turning Papist" was preferred to the Grand-Jury of Midsex, who found the Bill.

The 6th of December the three Commissioners by an express acquainted the King, "That they were to meet the Prince of Orange that night at Amesbury." But the next day they informed his Majesty, "That his Highness had made a new appointment to meet them at Hungerford, and had sent to them the Earls of Clarendon and Oxford, to desire them to make their proposals in writing." This message surprized the King, chiefly because the Prince had deputed the Earl of Oxford, who had never been concerned in any publick affair, and the Earl of Clarendon was mortal enemy of the Marquis of Halifax. He inferred from thence, the Prince's unwillingness to come to any accommodation. For this cause, Barillon and Laufun earnestly pressed the King, to secure himself, the Queen, and the Prince of Wales, by a timely retreat from the Nation. But he was willing still to wait for the success of the negotiation with the Prince of Orange.

The substance of the proposals delivered by the King's Commissioners to the Prince was, "That the King ob" serving that all the causes of complaint, alledged by his Highness, seemed to be referred to a free Parliament, he had issued his writs for calling one (2). That he had sent commissioners to his Highness for adjusting all matters relating to the freedom of elections, and security of the Parliament; and, in order to that, proposed, that the respective armies might be kept at such a distance from London."

The Prince, who was then marching towards London, returned no answer to these proposals, but the next day, with the advice of the Lords and Gentlemen assembled with him, he put the following propositions into the hands of the King's commissioners.

"I. That all Papists and all such persons as are not qualified by law, be disbanded, disbanded, and removed from all employments, civil and military.
"II. That all proclamations that reflect upon us be recalled; and that if any persons, for having assisted us, have been committed, that they be forthwith set at liberty.

"III. That for the security and safety of the city of London, the custody and government of the Tower, be immediately put into the hands of the city.

"IV. That if his Majesty shall think fit to be in London, during the sitting of the Parliament, that we may be there also, with equal number of guards: And if his Majesty shall please to be in any place from London, whatever distance he thinks fit, that we may be at a place of the same distance; and that the respective armies be from London thirty miles; and that no further forces be brought into the Kingdom.

"V. That for the security of the city of London, and their trade, Tilbury fort be put into the hands of the said city.

"VI. That a sufficient part of the publick revenue be assigned to us, for the support and maintenance of our troops, until the sitting of a free Parliament.

"VII. That to prevent the landing of the French, or other foreign troops, Portsmouth may be put into such hands, as by his Majesty and us shall be agreed on."

These proposals were so reasonable, that the King himself could not help owning, They were better than he expected. Indeed, the Prince of Orange ever adhered to this Declaration, in which he only demanded entire freedom for the Parliament, and a sufficient security for the city of London, without stipulating any other advantage for himself than the maintenance of his army, till the sitting of the Parliament, that is, for about six weeks. As the King could no longer hope to execute his first designs, it seems, that nothing could be more advantageous to him in his present situation, deserted by all, and not knowing which way to turn, than to be freed from his difficulties, by restoring things to their ancient and natural state. Had he discovered a willingness to embrace these proposals, probably, the Parliament would have asked no more of him, than the establishment of their Religion and Laws, so as not to be easily shaken, and he might have kept his Crown, though perhaps with some diminution of the rights claimed by himself, his brother, father, and grandfather. This cannot be said to be a hard condition, considering how he had governed, and the present situation of his affairs. He even seemed at first disposed to accept these proposals, and refer to the next Parliament the decision of all differences, since that very day he called an extraordinary Council of all the Lords that were in town. As it was plain, he would be advised to accept the proposals by all the Lords, it could hardly be doubted, that he had such an intention, and only called the Council for form sake. It is not known what passed in it, but only that the same Council was ordered to meet the next morning, to give their farther advice upon the exigency of affairs. Before the Council broke up, the King, addressing himself to the Duke of Bedford said, My Lord, you are a good man, and have a great influence: You can do much for me at this time. To which the Duke replied, I am an old man, and can do but little; then added with a deep sigh, I had once a son, that could now have been very serviceable to your Majesty. This was meant of the Lord Russell, beheaded in the late reign, who was sacrificed to the vengeance of the King, then Duke of York. The King was struck dumb with this answer, so that he could make no reply.

Every thing seemed to promise an accommodation, and it was not doubted, but the next day some resolution would be taken for the peace and security of the Kingdom. But that same night the King, as 'tis supposed, consulted with some of his popish counsellors, whose interested advice overthrew all these flattering expectations. These counsellors easily perceived, what they were to expect from a free Parliament. It was manifest, nothing could free the King from his present difficulties, but the delivering up the popish Religion to the resentments of the Protestants, and the passing such Acts as would hinder its being ever established in England. They therefore thought it more advantageous to their Religion, that the King should preserve all his pretensions, though unable to support them, than sacrifice them to the Parliament. To that end, they advised him to withdraw into France. They represented, how dishonorable it would be to retract what he had done, how prejudicial to the Catholic Religion, to be forced to give his assent to such Acts of Parliament as would tend only to render its establishment impracticable. That the Catholics would be entirely destitute of any resource, whereas by preserving his rights, he might hope to be restored by the arms of France, and finish the work so gloriously begun. In a word, by this interested Council, they clearly discovered, if the King had been willing or able to perceive it, that not his person, but their Religion was the sole ob-

1688. jeſt of their concern. In fine, to give more weight to their reasons, they intitled into the Queen ſuch apprehenſions, as made her uſe all her influence with the King, to engage him to do as he was adviſed. They told her, the Parliament would be far from being favorable to the King and herſelf: That being both ſuſpected, and even openly accuſed in the Prince of Orange's declaration, of impoſing an heir upon the Crown, it was very apparent, the Parliament, to favour the Princes of Orange, would declare the Prince of Wales ſuppoſitious: That perhaps the herſelf would be accuſed for the fact, ſince it was not ſcrupled to impeach the Queen, her Mother-in-law, for matters much leſs important: That a ſhort exile with a powerful and generous Prince, who was able to reſtore them, was preferable to living in their own Kingdom, with only the ſhadow of ſovereignty, in diſhonour, indigence, and in dependence upon thoſe whom they ought to command. Theſe conſiderations ſupported, as it is pretended, by Barillon and Lauſan, made ſuch an impreſſion upon the Queen, that ſhe reſolved to retire into France with the Prince of Wales, after a poſitive promiſe from the King, that he would follow her with all convenient ſpeed.

Purſuant to this reſolution, in the night between the 9th and 10th of December, the Queen in diſguiſe croſſed the Thames to Lambeth in an open boat, expoſed to wind and rain. At Lambeth, under the walls of a Church, ſhe waited till a coach could be got ready in the next Inn. She went from thence to Graveſend, where ſhe embarked with the Prince of Wales, on a ſmall veſſel, which conveyed them ſafely to Calais. From thence ſhe went to Verſailles, where ſhe was received by the King of France with great marks of affection, which was ſome alleviation to her melancholy ſituation.

The King being fully determined to follow the Queen, waited but one day to execute his deſign. The night between the 10th and 11th of December, in a plain ſuit, and a bob wigg, he took water at Whitehall, accompanied only by Sir Edward Holes, Mr. Sheldon, and Abbadie a Frenchman, page of the back-flairs, without acquainting any other with his intention. If the manner in which this monarch intended to leave his Dominions is impartially conſidered, it will hardly be denied, that this was an entire deſertion of them, and putting of his ſubjects into the ſtate in which nature dictates to men, to provide for their own ſecurity. Firſt, he fled without being purſued, and without any cauſe to fear, either for his life or liberty. So that it is manifeſt, his conſcience ſuggeſted evils to him, which were never intended. Secondly, he fled without any provision for the Government of the Kingdom. From this conduct it was afterwards inferred, that he abandoned his ſubjects in a perfect anarchy, and thereby authorized them to chuſe what form of Government they pleaſed, or to elect another King. Thirdly, by his flight he violated the promiſe ſo ſolemnly made in his proclamation, of calling a Parliament. Fourthly, before he went off, he writ to the Earl of Feversham to diſband the army, without any care of their pay, probably, on purpoſe to cauſe diſturbances in the Kingdom, by the diſcontents of the officers and ſoldiers. Fifthly, he ordered all the writs to be burnt, that were not ſent out, for electing the Parliament, imagining, doubtleſs, that after his departure, it would not be poſſible to aſſemble a Parliament, which by the laws could only be called by the King. Sixthly, when he took water, he threw the Great-Seal into the Thames, that nothing might be legally done in his abſence. If this may not be called a real deſertion of his Kingdom, it will be difficult to give a name to ſuch proceedings.

As ſoon as the King's flight was known, a general conſternation enſued, moſt people being ignorant how they were to behave on ſo extraordinary an occaſion. However, about thirty ſpiritual and temporal Lords met at Guild-Hall, and ſent for the Lord-Mayor and Aldermen. After a ſhort conſultation, it was reſolved, to adhere to the Prince of Orange, and ſend deputies to him, with this reſolution ſigned by the whole aſſembly. Then they ſent for Colonel Skelton Lieutenant of the Tower, of whom they demanded the keys, which he willingly reſigning, they were given to the Lord Lucas. Preſently after, the Common-Council of the city ſent deputies (1) to the Prince, with an addreſs, imploring his protection, and praying him to honour the city with his preſence.

Though, upon the King's flight, the Militia of London and Weſtmiſter were immediately up in arms, they could not prevent the mob from aſſembling and committing ſome diſorders. They confined their rage chiefly to the Muſeums erected by the King in the city and ſuburbs, which they demolished entirely, and made bonfires with the materials. And as there were alſo chapels in the houſes of Ambaſſadors, thoſe of the Spaniſh and Florentine Ambaſſadors were riſed, before a ſtop could be put to the diſorder. In the firſt of theſe chapels the principal Court-Papiſts had conveyed all their valuable effects, and this probably was the chief cauſe of the pillage. The houſes of the other Ambaſſadors were preſerved, by the great care of ſome Lords. The two Miniſters of Spain and Florence were afterwards largely recompenced for their loſſes (2).

During theſe irruptions of the mob, Chancellor Jefferies, diſguiſed in a ſeaman's habit, in order to eſcape in a veſſel freighted for Hanburgh, was diſcovered (3), as he was looking out of the window of the houſe where he had concealed himſelf. He was immediately ſeized by the mob, and, after many indignities put upon him, carried before the Lord-Mayor, who declined meddling with him. But the Chancellor ſeeing himſelf in the hands of an enraged mob, which threatened to tear him in pieces, deſired that he might be ſent to the Tower, which at laſt was granted him, not as a favour, but in hopes of ſeeing him ſhortly conducted from thence to the gallows. It is pretended, he offered to diſcover many ſecrets, and for that reaſon, was kept ſome time in priſon, till the affairs of the Government ſhould be ſettled. But he died in that interval, by the blows he had received, according to ſome; by drinking ſpirituous liquors, according to others; and as ſome pretend, of the ſtone. Never man had better deſerved a publick puniſhment, as an atonement for all the miſchiefs done to his country, and for all the blood ſpilt by his means.

Mean time, the Earl of Feversham, after having communicated the King's letter to the principal officers, diſmiſſed the army, and gave notice of it by a trumpet to the Prince of Orange, who returned no answer. This made it thought, the Prince did not approve of his conduct. And indeed it ſeems, that in ſuch a juncture, if he was unwilling to pay ſo much deference to the Prince, as to communicate to him the order before it was executed, he ſhould not have done it, at leaſt without the advice of the Lords aſſembled at London, who, in the preſent ſtate of the Kingdom, had a right to interpoſe in the Government. Accordingly, his conduct was greatly blamed; and this fault was the more taken notice of, as it occaſioned an alarm which threw the city and country into the utmoſt conſternation. Some Iriſh ſoldiers of the diſbanded troops, finding themſelves moneyleſs, and incapable of ſuſtaining in a country where they were ſo generally hated, reſolved to keep themſelves from ſtarving, by forcibly entering a Country-houſe. Whereupon, a man of the neighbourhood runs directly to London, crying, as he paſſed, "That the Iriſh were up, and marching to London, firing of houſes, and putting man, woman, and child, to the ſword." The news immediately flew through the city, and cauſed a ſtrange pannick-ſear. This report, as it went along, ſo gathered, that the terror was increaſed. The city was in alarm all night, expecting every moment the arrival of the Iriſh. Some prepared for flight, others ran to arms, not a window in London and Weſtmiſter but what was illuminated. From London the conſternation ſpread through the whole Kingdom, ſo that in the remote parts, where people had more time to conſider what was to be done, a reſolution was taken, in caſe the news ſhould be true, of deſtroying all the Iriſh, and Papiſts in England. Happily, this terror vaniſhed in London as ſoon as the real cauſe of it was known.

Mean time, the Prince of Orange being advanced as far as Henley, and ſeeing the diſorders which might be committed by a diſbanded army, publiſhed a ſhort Declaration requiring all Colonels to call together the ſeveral officers and ſoldiers of their reſpective regiments, in ſuch places as they ſhould think convenient, and there to keep them in good order and diſcipline, till farther orders. This declaration was followed by another of the Lords aſſembled at London, to the ſame effect, with an additional promiſe of ſubſiſtence, till they ſhould be otherwiſe provided for, to all officers and ſoldiers who ſhould obey, and deliver up their arms to perſons appointed to receive them. Beſides this, all Magiſtrates were required to apprehend, and ſeize, all ſuch ſoldiers as ſhould not repair to their reſpective bodies, and to deal with them as Vagabonds.

All theſe things were tranſacted, in the belief, that the King had left the nation; and indeed he was gone from Whitehall with that intention. He was got as far as a little place near Feversham, and had even embarked in a ſmall veſſel that was to carry him to a frigate, ready to tranſport him to France. This veſſel not being able to fail immediately, by reaſon of a tempeſtuous wind, Sir Edward Holes, one of the King's attendants, ſent his footman to the Poſt-office at Feversham. His livery was known by a man, who told ſome others, that Sir Edward was not far off. The bootman was followed to the River-side, and seen to make signs to some people on board a bark, whereupon the fishermen, and other persons of Feversham, immediately boarded the vessel where the King was. Sir Edward was soon known, and the King being taken for his chaplain, had many indignities put upon him. Then, searching him, they found four hundred guineas, and several valuable seals and jewels, which they took from him. Amongst the people who crowded into the ship, there happened to be a Constable who knew the King, and throwing himself at his feet, begged him to forgive the rudeness of the mob, and ordered restitution to be made of what had been taken from him. The King received the jewels and the seals, but gave the four hundred guineas among them. After this, he desired to be gone, but the people, by a sort of violence conducted him to a publick Inn in the town. Here he sent for the Earl of Winchelsea, Lord-Lieutenant of the County, who prevailed with him not to leave the Kingdom, but to return towards London.

This news being brought to London produced various effects. Some wished the King had never been stopp'd, others were glad of an opportunity to convince him, there was never any ill design against his person. The Lords and the Magistrates of London, who had made such advances towards the Prince of Orange, were confounded at their halfe, and were under some fear, in case the state of affairs should be altered. At last, the Lords assembling, thought proper to appoint four of their body (*) to wait on the King, with an invitation to return to Whitehall, and with assurances of being received with all due respect; and coaches were immediately sent to bring him. At the same time, an express was dispatched to the Prince of Orange, to acquaint him that the King was still in the nation. The Prince, who was come as far as Windsor, was not a little surprized at the news. He was marching to London to settle with the Lords, by whom he was expected, the affairs of the nation, in the supposition, that the King had left it. But his Majesty's return threw the Prince into great perplexity, and of course would oblige him to take other measures. Nevertheless, as the King had no army, and by his hasty flight, had entirely forfeited the confidence of all his friends, and the esteem of his enemies, as he was not in a condition to command, but in some measure depended upon others, the Prince dispatched Monsieur Zuylewijn to him, to desire him to remain at Rochester, till it could be agreed what was to be done. But Zuylewijn missing his way, the King came to London the 16th of December, about four in the afternoon, where he was received with acclamations as if he had been returning from victory.

The King being restored to his Palace, and in some manner to his deserted royalty, discovered an inclination to resume his old measures, and still brave the Protestants. In all appearance, the acclamations as he passed through London, had revived his courage, and put him in hopes of a general declaration in his favour. The first thing he did was to publish an order of Council, wherein he said, "That being given to understand, that divers outrages had been committed in several parts of the Kingdom, by burning, pulling down, and defacing of houses, he commanded all Lord-Lieutenants, &c. to prevent such outrages for the future, and suppress all riotous assemblies. This was his last publick act, which crowned so many others done in his reign, in favour of the Papists. Moreover, he discharged Leiburn a popish Bishop, who had been sent to Newgate, and during his short stay at Whitehall, was surrounded, as formerly, with Priests, Jesuits, and Irishmen.

The King, in his journey to London, dispatched the Earl of Feversham with a letter to the Prince, "Kindly to invite him to the Palace at St. James's, with what number of guards and troops he should think convenient to bring along with him, that they might amicably and personally confer together about the means of redressing the publick grievances." The Prince returned no answer.

But the moment the Earl of Feversham was out of his presence, Monsieur Bentick demanded his sword, and told him, he had orders to secure him. This doubtless, was owing to his precipitate disbanding the army. Some indeed have thought it was only a pretence to remove him from the King's person, being suspected of giving him ill advice, or perhaps, because he was too much devoted to him, though he ever professed the Protestant Religion.

In a Council held by the Prince, and the English Lords who were with him, it was resolved, "That the Royal Palace at Whitehall, being still crowded with Irish Papists, Priests and Jesuits, his Highness could not with ease and safety remain at St. James's, where he must necessarily go the next day, without his Majesty and his popish guards were removed within a reasonable distance from London." Moreover, an accident which happened two days before, provoked those who were concerned for the Prince's life. The Duke of Grafton marching through the Strand at the head of a regiment, to take Tilbury fort out of the hands of the Irish, an Irish officer riding up to him, fired a pistol at him; for which he was shot dead upon the place. Much more might such an attempt be apprehended against the Prince, from some of the King's guards. In the debate, it was proposed to send the King prisoner to Breda. But the Prince of Orange rejected the proposal with indignation, protesting, That he could not consent to put him under any restraint. At last, since the Prince's presence at London was absolutely necessary, it was agreed, that the King should be desired to remove to Ham, a house belonging to the Dukes of Lauderdale. It appears from hence, that the King's approbation was no longer considered as absolutely necessary to settle the affairs of the Kingdom. And indeed, it seems, that since he would have abandoned all, he had no right to pretend to any thing. Pursuant to this resolution, the Prince of Orange signed an order, directed to the Marquis of Halsifax, the Earl of Shrewsbury, and the Lord Delamere, to acquaint the King with it, and to tell him, he should be attended by his guards, to preserve him from any disturbances.

Immediately after, the Prince ordered the regiment of the Dutch Guards, consisting of three Battalions, to march and take possession of all the Posts about Whitehall and St. James's, either by persuasions or force. The King being informed of it, sent for Count Salms, who commanded these guards, and desired him, If it could be, to let him have his own guard at Whitehall, only for that night, but the Count alleging his order, to relieve all the Posts, the King answered, do your office. At ten a clock at night, the Dutch blue guards entered St. James's house, and towards eleven, those who were ordered to Whitehall, moved through the Park, and with lighted match, and in order of battle, marched up to the King's guards. The Captain of the guards scrupling to dislodge, at last received the King's orders to retire. After this, the Dutch took possession of the Guard house, and at the same time relieved all the Posts about Whitehall and the Park, placing every where double centries. So that, during the rest of the night, the King was really in the power of the Prince of Orange. An hour after midnight, the three Lords appointed by the Prince came to Whitehall, and sent to awake the King for an audience. The King ordering them to come to his bed-side, they delivered the Prince's message, which was to desire his Majesty's departure to Ham; to which the King consented; but after they were withdrawn, he ordered them to be recalled, and bid them tell the Prince, that he desired rather to go to Rochester, according to the Prince's message by Zuylewijn, to which the Prince consented that very night. His answer coming to the King at eight in the morning, the King about noon took a barge, attended by the Earls of Ailesbury, Litchfield, Arran, and Dumbarton, six of the yeomen of his guard, and about a hundred of the Dutch guards, commanded by the Lieutenant Colonel of the regiment. About nine at night he arrived at Graveland, where he found his own coaches, and some troops of the Militia, by whom he was the next day conducted to Rochester.

The Prince arrived at London the same day the King left Whitehall, and lodged at St. James's, where he received the compliments of the Nobility, the Lord-Mayor, Aldermen, and Common-council of the city of London. From this time it may be said, the King was a mere cypher. He was not a prisoner, but had no power left of doing good or hurt, so that most of the Lords who had any employments at Court, laid down the badges of their offices, as the Staff, the Keys, &c. as believing they had no longer any right to exercise the same.

During the rejoicings at London, for the Prince's arrival, the mob insulted the Papists again, not excepting Ambassadors. As there was properly no Government, such disorders were almost unavoidable, no person daring to undertake to restrain them. At last, the Privy-Council ordered, that all foreigners should be permitted quietly to leave the Kingdom. The Prince of Orange sent particular passes to the Pope's Nuncio, the Envoys of Poland, Savoy, and Medena. The popish Lords, Langdale and Montgomery, were released. But the Earls of Peterborough and Salisbury were kept in custody, on account of impeachments against them. Remijs Priests and Jesuits, apprehended since the King's flight, were likewise detained.

Mean while, as it was absolutely necessary to put an end to the present anarchy, the Prince of Orange assembled the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in London, to the number of above threecore, and made this short speech to them. "My Lords, I have desired you to meet here, to advise the best manner how to pursue the ends of my Declaration, in calling a free Parliament, for the preservation of the Protestant Religion, the restoring the Rights and Liberties of the Kingdom, and settling the same, p. 537"

1688. "that they may not be in danger of being again subverted." Upon speaking these words, he withdrew and left them to consult together. His declaration was read, and the Lords voted him their particular thanks. Then they resolved to assemble every day in their old House at Westminster, and named five of the most eminent lawyers (1) to assist them in the room of the Judges, who were most of them absent. It was farther proposed, that the whole assembly should sign the association subscribed by the nobility and gentry at Exeter. To this all agreed, except the Duke of Somerset, the Earls of Pembroke and Nottingham, the Lord Wharton, and all the Bishops but that of London. The objection of the Bishops was chiefly founded upon the unchristian word Revenge, which, to satisfy them, was afterwards changed for that of Punishment.

The Bishops and some Temporal Lords refused to sign the Association, Echard.

In the mean time, the King was at Rochester in a melancholy situation. He perceived, his flight had done him an irreparable injury. The proceedings at London showed, that he was no longer regarded as a King to be intrusted with the Government, and it was not in his power to restore himself by force. Nevertheless, some of his friends pressed him to call a Parliament, assuring him that since his misfortune there was a great turn in the minds of the City and army, and that compassion for him generally prevailed. But the very name of a free Parliament made him tremble. For, besides that his conscience might reproach him and inspire this fear, he plainly saw, the least which could befall him, would be, that the Parliament would take effectual measures for the security of the Protestant Religion, and that, as long as he lived, he should be ever distrusted. Probably it was the fear of passing the rest of his days in so uncomfortable a state, which determined him to withdraw into France. Indeed in taking that course, he might hope one day to be restored by the assistance of that Crown. Whereas by staying in England, he saw no other advantage, than the enjoyment of a Royalty, surrounded with troubles and mortifications, and in which he could not without danger attempt to recover his former authority. Whatever were his motives, which can only be guessed, on the 23d of December, about three in the morning, he privately withdrew, taking with him only the Duke of Berwick his natural son, Mr. Skelton, and Abadie, and went on horseback to a place near the river, where he embarked on a small Frigate, which landed him safely at Ambleuse in France, from whence he repaired to St. Germans. It was easy to execute this design, no person about him having orders to stop or hinder him from disposing of himself as he pleased. Very probably, the Prince of Orange received not less satisfaction from this second, than he had from the first, flight. The King's presence in the Nation could not but greatly embarrass him. Besides his natural generosity, he had promised the Princess that nothing should be attempted against the life or liberty of her father. So, the King could not do a greater service to the Prince, than voluntarily to retire out of the Kingdom. And the more, as this afterwards furnished a pretence to say, he had abdicated the Crown, which abdication paved the Prince's way to the throne. When the King quitted Rochester he left the following paper written with his own hand.

"The World cannot wonder at my withdrawing myself now the second time. I might have expected somewhat better usage, after what I wrote to the Prince of Orange, by my Lord Feverham, and the Instructions I gave him: But instead of an answer, such as I might have hoped for, what was I to expect after the usage I received, by making the said Earl a Prisoner, against the practice and Law of Nations? The sending his own guards at eleven at night, to take possession of the posts at Whitehall, without advertising me in the least manner of it: The sending to me at one of the clock at midnight, when I was in bed, a kind of order by three Lords, To be gone out of my Palace before twelve that same morning? After all this, how could I hope to be safe, so long as I was in the power of one, who had not only done this to me, and invaded my Kingdoms, without any just occasion given for it; but that did, by his first Declaration, lay the greatest aspersions upon me that malice could invent, in that clause of it which concerns my son. I appeal to all that know me, nay, even to himself, that in their consciences neither he, nor they, can believe me in the least capable of so unnatural a villany, nor of so little common sense, to be imposed on in a thing of such a nature as that. What had I then to expect from one, who by all arts, hath taken such pains to make me appear as black as hell to my own people, as well as to all the world besides? What effect that hath had at home, all mankind have seen by so general a defection in my army, as well as in the nation, amongst all sorts of people.

"I was born free, and desire to continue so: and tho' I ventured my life very frankly on several occasions, for the good and honour of my country, and am as free to do so again (and which I hope I shall yet do as old as I am, to redeem it from the slavery it is like to fall under) yet I think it not convenient to expose my self to be so secured, as not to be at liberty to effect it; and for that reason to withdraw, but so as to be within call whenever the nation's eyes shall be opened, so as to see how they have been imposed upon by the specious pretences of Religion and Property. I hope it will please God to touch their hearts, out of his infinite mercy, and to make them sensible of the ill condition they are in, and bring them to such a temper, that a legal Parliament may be called; and that, amongst other things which may be necessary to be done, they will agree to Liberty of Conscience to all Protestant Dissenters; and that those of my own persuasion may be so far considered, and have such a share of it, as they may live peaceably and quietly, as Englishmen and Christians ought to do, and not be obliged to transplant themselves; which would be very grievous, especially to such as love their own Country. And I appeal to all men, who are considering men, and have had experience, whether any thing can make this nation so great and flourishing, as Liberty of Conscience? Some of our neighbours dread it. I could add much more, to confirm what I have said, but now is not the proper time."

This paper remained not unanswered. As I have not been able to procure Dr. Burnet's animadversions upon it (2), I shall endeavour to supply the want with some observations.

The first is taken from Mr. Echard, who very justly observes, That though the King gave some reasons for his second defection, he gave none at all for his first. Now it was the first, which chiefly demonstrated, that he chose rather to abandon his Kingdoms, than be forced to restore Religion and the Laws.

2. The King supposed, that after the dissembling manner in which he had been treated by the Prince of Orange, he had no room to believe himself safe. And yet he could not deny, that he had been in the power of the Prince, by whom his person was untouched. At the very time of his writing this paper, he was at full liberty to concert measures for his escape into France, and actually executed that design, without any opposition.

3. What he said concerning the birth of the Prince of Wales, was founded upon the impossibility, that those who knew him, should believe him capable of so unnatural a villany. But it was the very belief of his being privy to that unnatural villany, which fixed the imputation upon him.

4. He ascribes the defection of his army and the whole nation, to the artifices and calumnies of the Prince of Orange; whereas the whole history of his reign is a demonstration, that it could only be imputed to his own conduct.

5. He supposed, that he withdrew himself, in order to come and redeem the nation from slavery. But this supposition has been destroyed by the event, there having been in England but very few, who really wished his restoration.

6. He insisted, that liberty of Conscience was absolutely necessary to render the English nation great and flourishing. But there was not, perhaps, a single Englishman, who believed this was the end proposed by the King, or that was not convinced, it was only a pretence to introduce his own, and to destroy the Protestant Religion.

7. His saying, that some neighbours dreaded the nation's becoming too great, by the establishment of liberty of Conscience, was only an insinuation to make the people believe, that the Dutch had lent their ships and forces to the Prince of Orange, for that very reason.

INTERREGNUM.

UPON the King's departure, there was an Interregnum, but of such a nature, as the like had never of old been known in England. It was not owing to the death, but to the flight, of the Sovereign. So, at the same time, the nation was without a King, and without any one to represent him, and to take care of the Government; and yet there was a King, but a fugitive, and who pretended not to renounce his rights. In such circumstances, it is in vain to appeal to Laws, Customs, or Precedents, since the difference between this state, and that which laws and customs suppose, is manifest.

As soon as the Lords heard of the King's departure, they believed themselves invested with a power to act in their own names, because indeed, in such a juncture, it could properly belong only to them, to take upon them the Government. There was no Parliament in being, and consequently no House of Commons to join with them. By the death or desertion of the King, all publick offices and employments cease, because they come from him. There remains therefore no authority but in the Peers, who are nearest the Throne, and consequently, more authorized to take care of the Government, till it can be settled by the body of the nation, by means of a Parliament. The State of the Kingdom was such, that there was no example of the like to serve for a precedent. The King had abandoned the nation, without being forced to it. He was in full liberty, and there did not appear any other motive of his flight than the fear of being obliged to call a free Parliament, which, probably, would not have approved of his late measures, but restored the Constitution to its antient state. The Prince of Orange pretended not to have a right to govern; his pretensions consisted only in procuring a free Parliament. But this Parliament must be called by some authority. And by what authority could a Parliament meet, if the nation continued in anarchy, where no person would have a right to meddle with the Government? It was therefore the Peers, who alone were entitled to take care of the State, or else it must be said, that because the King was pleased to desert the nation, without settling the Government, the State was to remain in anarchy, till he should think fit to resume the care of it. Let the inconveniences arising from the power assumed by the Lords, be never so much urged, those which anarchy would have produced, were infinitely greater and more dangerous. Nay, who knows, whether one of the motives of the King's flight, was not to leave the nation in this state of confusion? Be that as it will, the juncture was such, that extraordinary proceedings could not be avoided.

The first thing done by the Peers, after consulting together, was the addressing the Prince of Orange, "To take upon him the administration of publick affairs, both civil and military; the disposal of the publick revenue; and the care of Ireland, till the meeting of the intended Convention." The address was dated the 25th of December. By a second address they desired him, "To issue out missive letters, subscribed by himself, to the Lords Spiritual and Temporal being Protestants, and to the several counties, cities, and boroughs, containing directions for the chusing, within ten days, such a number of persons to represent them, as are of right to be sent to Parliament." These addresses were signed by about ninety Lords, that were then present in the House. They were followed by an order from the same Peers, to all Papists to depart the city of London, and ten miles from the same, and not to remove from their habitations above five miles; excepting the servants of the Queen-Dowager, the domesticks of foreign Ministers, and all House-keepers in London, and ten miles from the same, who had been traders for three years last past, provided they gave in to the Lord-Mayor, their names and places of abode, in eight days; and also such popish officers as should give bail in five days, to appear the first day of the term, and to be on their good behaviour in the mean time; but such officers as should neglect, were to be taken into custody.

The word Convention, to signify a Parliament assembled without the customary formalities, was new in England, where it had been, as I think, but once used in that sense, namely, after the Restoration of King Charles II. This Prince finding, upon his return into England, a Parliament sitting which had not been summoned by him, would not own it for a Parliament, on account of the consequences. But on the other hand, he would not deprive himself of the benefit of the resolutions of this Parliament, which had restored him to the throne of his ancestors. So, to reconcile these two things together, he was willing to own it as a Convention. Probably, the word was borrowed from what is practised in Scotland, where a difference is put between a Convention of the States, and a Parliament. It was therefore this Convention of the year 1688, that the Lords had in view, when they addressed the Prince of Orange to call one. But as this was a single precedent, and as the Convention of the year 1689, had been first called under the name of a Parliament, the Prince thought, that besides the suffrages of the Peers, it was proper to be authorized by others, which might pass for those of the people. He therefore published an order, "Desiring all such persons as had served in any of the Parliaments during the reign of the late King Charles II, to meet him at St. James's, upon the 26th of December, by ten of the clock in the morning. He desired likewise, that the Lord Mayor and Court of Aldermen of the City of London, and fifty of the Common-Council, would be there at the same time."

In pursuance of this order, about a hundred and sixty members, the Aldermen of London (the Mayor being indisposed) and the Deputies of the Common Council, met at St. James's on the day appointed, where the Prince briefly told them, "That he had come to the city, and that, to advise the best manner how to pursue the ends of his declaration, in calling a free Parliament, for the preservation of the Protestant Religion, and the restoring the Rights and Liberties of the Kingdom." They all repaired immediately to the Commons House in 17.

After, where the first question they debated, was, What authority they had to assemble? Upon which it was soon agreed, that the request of the Prince was a sufficient warrant. The next question was, How the Prince could take upon him the administration of affairs, without a distinguishing name or title? But as this question tended to prolong the deliberations, and defeat the ends proposed by the meeting, it was thought proper to wave such questions in their future debates. An Alio-ciation was likewise proposed to be signed, but every person was left at liberty to subscribe it or not. After these previous debates, they resolved to address the Prince, to take upon him the administration of publick affairs, until the meeting of the Convention, the 22d day of January next. The answer returned by the Prince to this address, and to that of the Lords, was the same, that he would endeavour, as far as he was able, to secure the peace of the nation, according to their desire.

During the King's stay at St. James's, the French Ambassador, had been very active to promote divisions amongst the Peers, with a view to serve the King. Of this the Prince was not ignorant; but as he was not yet invested with any authority, he was obliged to suffer it, tho' he knew he had not a greater enemy in England than that Ambassador. But the moment he was intrusted with the Government, he sent an express order to him to leave the Kingdom within four and twenty hours. At the same time, he sent St. Leger, a French Refugee, to attend him to the ship. That Gentleman could not forbear saying to the Ambassador as they were on the road, Sir, had any one told you a year ago, that a Refugee should be commissioned to see you out of England, would you have believed it? The Ambassador answered, Sir, cross over with me to Calais, and I will give you an answer.

On Sunday the 30th of December, the Prince of Orange went to the Royal Chapel at St. James's, where he was present at Divine Service (1), and a Sermon preached by Dr. Lloyd, Bishop of St. Asaph; after which he received the Sacrament from the hands of the Bishop of London. This publick profession of the established Religion, greatly contributed to dispel the fears of those, who dreaded his too zealous adherence to the Presbyterian Religion, in which he had been educated. But it must be observed, that though the difference between the Episcopal and Presbyterian Churches has occasioned much noise, disturbance, and enmity in England, yet both then and now, very few foreign Protestants scruple to communicate with the Church of England.

The next day, the Prince published a Proclamation, authorizing all publick officers, not being Papists, to act in their respective offices, till the meeting of the intended Convention, or other order to the contrary.

The same day he paid a visit to the Queen-Dowager, who indirectly asked him to release her Chamberlain the Earl of Feversham, which the Prince readily granted.

Though in the history of the two last reigns I have said but little of the affairs of Scotland, the Reader however may have remarked, that this Kingdom was entirely subjected to an arbitrary power, and withheld to Episcopacy, contrary to the general bent of the people. When the Prince of Orange's declaration for Scotland, (the same in substance with that for England) appeared there, the Presbyterians began to take courage, those at the helm not daring to use any violence for fear of a general insurrection, which would have been extremely prejudicial to the King's affairs at that juncture. Things remained in this situation, till the King's party began to retire into England. For though the Scotch Bishops had published an abhorrence of the Prince's expedition, it was by no means the sentiments of the nation in general. Every one felt the weight of the yoke imposed on them, and the Episcopalians themselves had reason to fear, that under the pretence of humbling the Presbyterians, the King intended to destroy the Protestant Religion. So far their case was the same with that of the English. And therefore the Duke of Queensbury, and some other Scotch Gentlemen were come to London, to desire a free Parliament. Hence may be known, what the Scots

(1) Dr. Burnet read Prayers. Kennet, p. 540.

1688. thought of their present slavery. The Lord Chancellor, upon the news of King James's withdrawing, immediately resigned the Great Seal, and retired from Edinburgh. Upon which, the populace of that city, insulted and risted, not only the Roman Catholics, but also those who had appeared most devoted to the Episcopal party. So, the Bishops were forced to retire, to avoid the insults of the Presbyterians, who were now much superior to their late persecutors. On the other hand, several Scotch Lords and Gentlemen repaired to London, to observe the motions there, and to determine their conduct by that of the English.

The Prince of Orange, who could not visit Scotland, Jan. 7. assembled all the Scotch Nobility and Gentry then in London, State-Tracks T. l. p. 102. who meeting at St. James's, to the number of thirty Lords and fourscore Gentlemen, he asked their advice, what was to be done for the securing the Protestant Religion, and restoring their Laws, and Liberties, according to his Declaration? After this short speech, the Lords and Gentlemen repaired to the Council-Chamber at Whitehall, and chusing Duke Hamilton their President, consulted together, what advice was most proper to be given to the Prince. This affair was in effect settled the first day. But on the morrow, they were interrupted by a proposal from the Earl of Arran, that the King should be desired to return, and call a free Parliament. The tendency of this proposal was easily seen, and therefore it was unanimously rejected. At last, it was agreed to present an address to the Prince of Orange to desire him to take upon him the administration of all affairs both civil and military, and to call a general meeting of the States to be holden the 14th of the following March. This address being presented to the Prince, he desired time to consider of it, and two days after returned much the same answer as he had to the English.

The prospect from Ireland was not so pleasing. The Earl of Tyrconnel, a zealous Papist and entirely devoted to the King, was Lord-Lieutenant, and supported by an army, which he had taken care to compose of Popish officers and soldiers. There was room therefore to fear, that the Earl would not submit to the resolutions taken in England, and he was not then to be forced to obedience. Meantime, the Prince of Orange having received addresses not only from the English Lords and Commons concerning Ireland, but likewise from the Protestants of that Kingdom, could not but endeavour to procure the happiness of a nation which depended upon England. It was therefore thought proper to summon the Earl of Tyrconnel by a letter, to submit to the present administration in England. The delivery of this letter was committed to Colonel Hamilton, who promised to second it with his persuasions. But it was afterwards known, that he acted in concert with Tyrconnel directly to oppose it.

The Prince, and the Lords, as I have said, had ordered the forces disbanded by the Earl of Feverham to re-assemble. When this was done, the Prince discharged the arrears of the English army, with two hundred thousand pounds advanced in four days by the city of London, sixty thousand of which was lent by Sir Samuel Dashwood. After this, he ordered a reform of eight new raised regiments, besides the troop of Life-guards, commanded by the Lord Douer, who were all Papists. Then, several Colonels and other officers having resigned their Commissions on account of the new oath exacted of them, he filled their places with Protestants, and in a word, took all possible care to put the army under such a regulation, as might render it serviceable to the State.

The Archbishop of Canterbury had hitherto declined waiting on the Prince of Orange. But at last he sent a compliment to the Prince, and with seven or eight Bishops more signed the Association, after some words were softened in it, that gave them uneasiness.

About the same time, many Dissenting Ministers attended the Prince, and assured him of their fervent prayers for the preservation of his person, and the success of his endeavours for the defence and propagation of the Protestant Interest. The Prince returned a favorable answer, though expressed in general terms, insinuating, that it would not be his fault, if they were not made easy.

In the mean time, the elections for the members of the Convention proceeded with all imaginable freedom. The electors gave their votes according to their own inclinations, without any solicitations from the Prince, or his friends. Moreover, the Prince had ordered the soldiers to remove at a certain distance from the places of election, to take away all pretence of compulsion.

Mean while, the Prince considering, that the Convention was to settle the Government, thought it proper to send for his Princess; since if, as it was probable, the Convention should declare the throne vacant, no person had a juster pretension to it than she. Very likely also, he thought he had himself room to aspire to it, by his late great service to the English. But a severe frost retarded her departure 1688. from Holland longer than he expected.

The Commons met the 22d of January in two Houses, 1688-9. as a Parliament. The Peers chose [George Savile] Mar-^{the Con-}quis of Hallifax for their Speaker, and the Commons, Mr. Henry Powle. In each House was read the following letter from the Prince of Orange, on the occasion of their meeting:

"My Lords and Gentlemen,
"I HAVE endeavoured to the utmost of my power, The Prince of Orange's Letter to the Convention.
"to perform what was desired from me, in order to the publick peace and safety; and I do not know that any thing hath been omitted which might tend to the preservation of them, since the administration of affairs was put into my hands. It now lieth upon you to lay the foundations of a firm security for your Religion, your Laws, and your Liberties. I do not doubt, but that by such a full and free Representative of the nation, as is now met, the ends of my Declaration will be attained. And since it hath pleased God hitherto to bless my good intentions with so great success, I trust in him, that he will compleat his own work, by sending a spirit of peace and union to influence your counsels, that no interruption may be given to a happy and lasting settlement.
"The dangerous condition of the Protestants in Ireland, requiring a large and speedy succour, and the present state of things abroad, oblige me to tell you, that next to the danger of unseasonable divisions amongst our selves, nothing can be so fatal as too great delay in your consultations. The States, by whom I have been enabled to rescue this nation, may suddenly feel the ill effects of it, both by being too long deprived of the service of their troops, which are now here, and of your early assistance against a powerful enemy, who hath declared a war against them. And as England is by treaty already engaged to help them upon such exigencies, so I am confident, that their cheerful concurrence to preserve this Kingdom with so much hazard to themselves, will meet with all the returns of friendship and assistance, which may be expected from you, as Protestants and Englishmen, whenever their condition will require it.
"Given at St. James's the 22d day of January, 1688-9."

After the reading of this letter, the two Houses presented an address to the Prince, in which they acknowledged him under God, the deliverer of the nation. They approved likewise of all that he had done since he had been intrusted with the administration, which they prayed him to continue till farther application should be made to him by them, which should be done with all convenient speed. They promised also to dispatch the matters recommended to them by his letter. The Prince in his answer accepted the offers made him by the two Houses, and strongly pressed them to a consideration of the affairs of Europe.

The first thing done by the two Houses after their address of thanks to the Prince, was to appoint a day of publick thanksgiving to God, for the happy deliverance of the nation. As, on these occasions, prayers suited to the day are always composed by the Bishops, they had an order to insert a particular prayer for the Prince of Orange.

In the mean time, King James, perceiving the prejudice his flight would do him, endeavoured to prevent it, by a letter directed to the Lords, and others of his Privy Council. He repeated the reasons contained in the writing left on his table at his departure from Richster, and declared his intention to return to England for the holding a free Parliament. He reproached the Prince of Orange with artifices to hinder his holding such a Parliament, and required their advice, what was fit to be done by him towards his returning. Though this letter was immediately printed and dispensed, it was little regarded. Even the persons to whom it was addressed, judged it not proper to return an answer, at a time the Convention was sitting. James therefore sent a letter of the same tenor to both Houses of the Convention, adding, a promise, on the word of a King, of a pardon even to those that betrayed him, (some few excepted) and a resolution by an Act of Oblivion, to cover all faults. But both Houses returning the letters unopened, the King's friends complained of it, as of a great hardship.

The House of Commons deferred their sitting till the 28th of January, to give time to the rest of their members to come up to town. That day, Mr. Dolben, son to the late Archbishop of York, made a long Speech to prove the vacancy of the throne, by the King's deserting the Kingdom. Upon this arose a debate, which held four or five hours, and ended with this memorable vote:

"That King James the Second, having endeavoured to subvert the Constitution of the Kingdom, by breaking the Original Contract between King and people; and, by

Edward
Kennet.

1688-9. petition was drawn up to be presented to the Lords, desiring, in plain terms, that the Prince and Princess of Orange might be settled on the throne. Care was taken to get this petition signed by all sorts of people; that by the great number of subscribers it might pass for the sense of the nation. But the Prince of Orange not liking this way of proceeding, sent the Lord-Mayor orders, to put a stop to this tumultuous project, which was accordingly done.

The 2d of February, the Lords sent a message, to acquaint the Commons with two amendments they had made to their vote of the 28th of January. The first was, instead of the word Abdicated, they would have Deserted be put in. The second, that the words, and that the throne is thereby become vacant, should be left out. The Commons, not pleased with these two amendments, appointed a committee to draw up reasons why they must insist upon their vote, and desired a conference with the Lords upon that subject. This conference produced no effect, each House persisting in their opinion. Only the Earl of Nottingham intimated from the Lords, that they insisted upon the amendments, not to favour King James, but solely to maintain Hereditary Right, in the fear that the election of a King might destroy that right. But the Commons persisting still in their opinion, by a superiority of two hundred and eighty two, against one hundred and fifty one, appointed twenty four of their most able members to manage on this extraordinary occasion at a free conference, for which the Lords named on their part, the Earl of Nottingham, Clarendon, Rochester, Pembroke, with the Bishop of Ely, and some others.

As this conference between the two Houses is the most remarkable, ever known in England, as well for the importance of the thing itself, as for the ability of the managers, I shall insert it at large, and take the liberty to add some Remarks, for the illustration of the Speeches made on this occasion.

Mr. Hampden, who opened the conference, said, My Lords, — “The word ABDICATED, the Commons conceive, is of a larger signification than the word “your Lordships are pleased to use, DESERTED; but “not too large to be applied to all the recitals in the beginning of the Commons vote, to which they meant it “should be applied. Nor ought it to be restrained to a voluntary express renunciation, only in word or writing; “overt-acts there are, that will be significant enough to amount to it. My Lords, That the common law of “England is not acquainted with the word, it is from the “modesty of our law, that it is not willing to suppose “there should be any unfortunate occasion of making use “of it.

“Your Lordships next amendment is, that your Lordships have left out the last words in the Commons vote, “And that the Throne is thereby vacant. My Lords, The Commons conceive it a true proposition, and that the “Throne is vacant; and they think they make it appear, “that this is no new phrase; neither is it a phrase that perhaps some of the old records may be strangers to, or not “well acquainted with: But they think it not chargeable “with consequences that your Lordships have been pleased “to draw from it, That it will make the Crown of England become elective. If the Throne had been full, we “know your Lordships would have assigned that, as a “reason of your disagreement, by telling us who filled it; “and it would be known by some publick royal act, which “might notify to the people, in whom the kingly Government resided; neither of which hath been done, and “yet your Lordships will not allow the Throne to be “vacant.”

Mr. Sommers (a) said, — “If it be an objection that “the word Abdicated hath not a known sense in the common law of England, there is the same objection against “the word Deserted: So that your Lordships first reason “hath the same force against your own amendment, as it “hath against the term used by the Commons. The “words are both Latin words, and used in the best authors, and both of a known signification; their meaning “is very well understood; though it be true, their meaning be not the same: The word Abdicare doth naturally “and properly signify, entirely to renounce, throw off, disown, relinquish any thing or person, so as to have no further “to do with it; and that whether it be done by express words, “or in writing, (which is the sense your Lordships put “upon it, and which is properly renunciation or cession;) “or, by doing such acts as are inconsistent with the holding, “or retaining of the thing; which the Commons take to “be the present case, and therefore made choice of the “word Abdicare, as that which they thought did, above all “others, most properly express that meaning: And in this “latter sense it is taken by others.” [Here, to show that “it was the true signification of the word, he urged the authorities of Grotius, Calvoth, Brisonius, Budæus, and Prætorius.] “But the word, Deserted, hath not only a very “doubtful signification, but in common acceptance, both “of the civil and common law, doth signify only a bare “withdrawing, a temporary leaving a thing, a neglect only “which leaveth the party at liberty, returning to it again.” [For this he quoted Spigelius and Bartolus, adding,] “Hence it appears, that that is called Desertion, which is “temporary and relievable: That is called Abdication, “where there is no power or right to return. So in the “civil law, the word Desert is used to signify, Soldiers “leaving their colours. And in the canon law to Desert “a benefice, signifies no more than to be Non-resident. “In both cases, the party hath not only a right of returning, but is bound to return again: Which, my Lords, “as the Commons do not take to be the present case, so “they cannot think that your Lordships do; because it is “expressly said in one of your reasons, given in defence “of the last amendment, That your Lordships have been, and are “willing, to secure the nation against the return of King “James; which your Lordships would not, in justice, do, “if you did look upon it as no more than a negligent withdrawing, which leaveth a liberty to the party to return. “For which reasons, my Lords, the Commons cannot “agree to the first amendment, to insert the word Deserted instead of Abdicated; because it doth not in any sort “come up to their sense of the thing: So they do apprehend it doth not reach your Lordships meaning, as it is “expressed in your reasons; whereas they look upon the “word Abdicated, to express properly what is to be inferred from that part of the vote, to which your Lordships “have agreed, That King James the Second, by going about “to subvert the Constitution, and by breaking the original “contract between King and People, and by violating the “fundamental laws, and by withdrawing himself out of the “Kingdom, hath thereby renounced to be a King, according “to the Constitution, by avowing to govern by a “despotic power, unknown to the Constitution, and inconsistent with it; he hath renounced to be King according to the law, such a King as he swore to be at the “Coronation, such a King to whom the allegiance of an “English subject is due; and hath set up another kind of “dominion, which is to all intents an Abdication, or abandoning of his legal title, as fully as if it had been done “by express words (1).

REMARK (1). It is easy to perceive, that these two Speeches of Mr. Hampden and Mr. Sommers refer to what was objected by the Lords in a former conference against the word Abdicated, and the variety of the Throne. I thought proper to omit that first conference, because most of the things therein alleged, are repeated in this. However, it may be seen here by the Commons answers, what the Lords objections were.

Mr. Serjeant Holt added, — “For that part of your “Lordships objection, That it is not a word known to the “Common Law of England, that cannot prevail; for your “Lordships very well know, we have very few words in “our Tongue; that are of equal antiquity with the “Common-law; your Lordships know the language of “England is altered greatly in the several successions of time, “and the intermixture of other nations; and if we should “be obliged to make use only of words then known and “in use, what we should deliver in such a dialect, would “be very difficult to be understood.

“Your Lordships second reason for your first amendment, in changing the word Abdicated for the word Deserted, is, Because in the common acceptance of the Civil “Law, Abdication is a voluntary express act of renunciation. That is the general acceptance of the word, and “I think the Commons do so use the word in this case, “because it hath that signification: But I do not know “whether your Lordships mean a voluntary express act “or formal deed of Renunciation: If you do so, I confess I know of none in this case: But my Lords, both “in the Common-Law of England, and in the Civil Law, “and in common understanding, there are express acts of “Renunciation that are not by deed; for if your Lordships please to observe, the Government and Magistracy “is under a trust, and any acting contrary to that trust, “is a Renouncing of the trust, though it be not a Renouncing by formal deed: For it is a plain declaration “by act and deed, though not in writing, that he who “hath the trust, acting contrary, is a disclaimer of the “trust; especially, my Lords, if the actions be such as “are inconsistent with, and subversive of this trust; “For how can a man in reason or sense, express a greater “Renunciation of a trust, than by the constant declarations of his actions to be quite contrary to that trust?”

Then the Earl of Nottingham spoke on the side of the Lords, and said, — “The main reason of the change

168. "of the word Defered, is upon the account of the consequence drawn in the conclusion of your vote, That the Throne is thereby vacant: That is, what the Commons mean by that expression, whether you mean it is so vacant as to null the succession in the hereditary line, and so all the heirs to be cut off, which we say will make the Crown Elective? And it may be fit for us to settle that matter first, and when we know what the consequence of the throne being vacant means in the vote as you understand it, I believe we should much better be able to settle the difference about the two words (2).

R.E.M. (2) It does not appear that the Commons had any thoughts of making the Crown Elective. This was a consequence ascribed to them by the Lords, to have an occasion to contradict the vacancy of the throne.

To this it was replied by Serjeant Maynard, "My Lords, when there is a present defect of one to exercise the administration of the Government, I do conceive, the declaring a vacancy, and provision of a supply for it, can never make the Crown Elective. The Commons apprehend there is such a defect now; and by consequence a present necessity for the supply of the Government, and that will be next for your Lordships consideration, and theirs afterwards. If the attempting the utter destruction of the subject, and subversion of the Constitution, be not as much an Abdication as the attempting of a father to cut his son's throat, I know not what is. My Lords, the Constitution, notwithstanding the vacancy, is the same; the Laws that are the foundations and rules of that Constitution are the same; but if there be in any particular instance, a breach of that Constitution, that will be an Abdication, and that Abdication will infer a vacancy. It is not that the Commons do say, The Crown of England is always and perpetually Elective; but it is more necessary that there be a supply, when there is a defect, and the doing of that would be no alteration of the Monarchy from a successive one to an Elective."

Then the Bishop of Ely on the side of the Lords said, "Gentlemen,—That Abdicated may be tacitly by some Overt-Acts, Mr. Sommers very truly did alledge out of Grotius: But I desire to know whether Grotius, that great author, in treating on this subject, doth not interpose this caution, If there be a yielding to the times: If there be a going away, with a purpose of seeking to recover what is for the present lost or forsaken: In plain English, if there were any thing of force or just fear in the case, that doth void the notion of Abdication."

Mr. Serjeant Maynard replied, "But, my Lords, that is not any part of the case declared by the Commons in this vote; when the whole Kingdom and the Protestant Religion, our Laws and Liberties have been in danger of being subverted, an enquiry must be made into the authors and instruments of this attempt; and if he who had the administration intrusted to him, be found the author and actor in it, what can that be but a renunciation of his trust, and consequently his place thereby vacant? Abdication, (under favour,) is an English word; and your Lordships have told us, the true signification of it is a Renunciation. We have indeed, for your Lordships satisfaction, shewn its meaning in foreign authors; it is more than a Defering the Government, or leaving it with a purpose of returning."

The Bishop of Ely replied, "The objection of the Lords against the word Abdicated, is, That it is of too large a signification for the case in hand. It seems to be acknowledged, that it reaches a great way; and therefore the Lords would have a word made use of, which signifies only, the ceasure of the exercise of a Right (3).

R.E.M. (3) Hitherto the Lords had not clearly discovered why they rejected the word Abdicated. It appears here, by what the Bishop of Ely says, that it was because this word expressed the Commons meaning too well, and therefore the Lords would have another word in its stead, from which the vacancy of the throne could not be inferred.

The Bishop added,—"If there be such a defect as hath been spoken of, it must be supplied; there is no question of that. And I think we have by another vote, declared, That it is inconsistent with our Laws, Liberties, and Religion to have a Popish to rule over this Kingdom: Which I take to be only as to the actual exercise and administration of the Government. It is Grotius his distinction between a Right, and the exercise of that Right; and as there is a natural incapacity for the exercise, as sickness, lunacy, infancy, doating old age, or an incurable disease, rendering the party unfit for human society, as leprosy, or the like; so, I take it, there is a moral incapacity; and that I conceive to be a full irremovable perfwation in a false Religion, contrary to the Doctrine of Christianity. Then there must be a provision undoubtedly made for supplying this defect in the exercise, and an intermediate Government taken care for; because become necessary for the support of the Government, if he to whom the right of succession doth belong, makes the exercise of his Government unpracticable, and our obedience to him, consistently with the Constitution of our Religion, impossible; but that, I take it, doth not alter that right, nor is an Abdication of the right (4.)

R.E.M. (4.) It must be remembered, that the Bishop of Ely's position, which was afterwards maintained by others, was, that there was a real distinction between a Right, and the exercise of that Right. They readily agreed, that James II, should be deprived of the exercise of the Right to govern, but not of the Right itself. Upon this distinction all the arguments of the Lords are grounded.

"Abdication (continued he) no doubt is, by adoption, an English word, and well known to Englishmen conversant in books. Now it is objected, that it is not a word as ancient as the Common-Law of England. We find it in Cicero,—where it sometimes signifies, The renouncing the actual exercise of a Right, and sometimes, The renouncing of the very Right, so that the signification is doubtful; and such words we hope the Commons will not think fit to use in a case of this nature and consequence as ours now in debate. And besides, the Lords apprehend, that great inconveniences will follow upon the use of this word, if it mean a renouncing absolutely of that Right.—Then there is another distinction in those authors that write concerning this point, which are chiefly the Civilians. There may be an Abdication that may forfeit the power of a King only; and there may be one, that may forfeit both that and the Crown too. It is a distinction indeed in other words, but to the same sense. Those Abdications that are of power only, are incapacities; whether those I call natural and involuntary, as defects of sense, age, or body, or the like; or moral or voluntary, as contrariety in Religion; an instance whereof there was lately in Portugal, which was a forfeiture only of the power, and, not of the name, and honour of a King; for though the Administration was put into the younger brother's hand, the Patents, and other publick Instruments ran in the elder brother's name (5.)

R.E.M. (5.) If the Bishop of Ely had only a view to James II, the instance of the natural incapacities which made Ashbone VI. King of Portugal, forfeit the exercise of the regal power, does not seem to be to his purpose; since these incapacities were not the point in question, with regard to James II, which may make it suspected, that he had an eye to the Prince of Wales. For, as will hereafter appear, the Lords, in maintaining, that the throne was not vacant, pretended, that by the civil or natural death of the King, the next heir was immediately to fill the throne, and this heir, according to some, was the Prince of Wales. But as he was a minor, an intermediate Governor must be appointed to govern in his name.

"This is not without all doubt naturally an Abdication in the full extent of the word; nor do I here, (as I said) consider, whether that the King be gone out of the Kingdom, or stay in it; but only, whether he be fit for the Administration, which must be provided for, be he here, or gone away. But the highest instance of an Abdication, is, when a Prince is not only unable to execute his power, but acts quite contrary to it; which will not be answered by so bare a word as endeavour. I take these to be all the distinctions of Abdications. Now, if this last instance of an Abdication of both power and right, take place in a succeeding Monarchy, the consequence will be, That there is a forfeiture of the whole right; and then that hereditary succession is cut off; which, I believe, is not intended by the Commons. But here is one thing that is mentioned in this vote, which I would have well considered, for the preservation of the Succession, and that is the Original Compact: We must think, sure, that meant of the Compact, that was made at the first time, when the Government was first instituted, and the conditions, that each part of the Government should observe on their part, of which this was the most fundamental, That King, Lords, and Commons, in Parliament assembled, should have the power of making new laws, and altering of old ones: And that being one Law which settles the Succession, it is as much a part of the Original Compact as any: Then if such a case happens, as an Abdication in a successive Kingdom, without doubt, the Compact being made to the King, his heirs, and successors, the disposition of the Crown cannot fall to us, till all the heirs do Abdicate too. There are indeed many examples, and too many interruptions in the lineal Succession of the Crown of England: I think I can instance in seven since the Conquest, wherein the right heir hath been put by: But that doth not follow, that every breach of the first Original Contract, gives us power to dispose of the lineal Succession; especially, I think

"think, since the Statutes of Queen Elizabeth, and King James the First, that have established the oath of Allegiance to the King, his heirs, and successors; the Law is stronger against such a disposition: I grant, that from King William the First, to Henry VIII., there has been seven interruptions of the legal line of hereditary Succession; but, I say, those Statutes are made since that time, and the making of new Laws, being as much a part of the Original Compact, as the observing old ones, or any thing else, we are obliged to pursue those Laws, till altered by the legislative Power, which singly, or jointly, without the royal assent, I suppose, we do not pretend to do."

R.E.M. (6). By this reasoning the Lords and Commons being agreed, that a Catholic King could not exercise the right of Government, and James II. being Catholic; and as he might possibly have an infinite series of successors from father to son, all Catholics, it would follow, that England might be always governed by Regents.

"These Laws being made since the last interruption, we are not to go by any precedent that was made before the making those Laws. So that, all that I conceive ought to be meant by our vote is, But the setting aside the person that broke the Contract: And, in a successive Kingdom, an Abdicacion can only be a forfeiture, as to the person himself. I hope, and am persuaded, that both Lords and Commons do agree in this, Not to break the line of Succession, so as to make the Crown elective. And if that be declared, that this Abdicacion of King James the Second, reacheth no farther than himself; and that it is to continue in the right line of Succession, that, I hope, will make all of one mind in this important affair."

R.E.M. (7). For the better understanding the Bishop of Elly's Speech, as well as some others that follow, it must be observed, that among the Lords who had voted for the vacancy of the throne, by a majority of eleven voices, there were two sorts of men. The one, without any desire to favour King James, or the Prince of Wales, had no other view than to oppose the Republican party, who, under colour of gratitude to the Prince of Orange, were labouring with all their power to have him elected King, reckoning it would be a large step towards advancing the authority of the people, and rendering the Crown elective. Some of the Lords voted against the vacancy of the throne, chiefly in opposition to this party. But there were others who carried their views farther, and by rendering the settling of the Government impracticable, laboured indirectly, either to cause King James to be recalled, or the Prince of Wales to be acknowledged for King, knowing it would be impossible to prove him supposititious in a legal manner. But as these concealed themselves among the others, and pretended only to defend hereditary right, it is hard to know by the Speeches, who designed only to maintain hereditary right, and who had farther views. This the Reader is to remember, that he may not imagine, all the Lords who voted against the vacancy of the throne, were for King James.

Then the Earl of Clarendon spoke on the Lords side, and said, — "This breaking the Original Contract is a language that hath not been long used in this place; nor known in any of our Law-books or publick Records; it is sprung up, but as taken from some late authors, and those none of the best received. It is not denied, That the King is bound by Law, and bound to perform the Laws made, and to be made. But I would take notice that his obligation thereunto, doth not proceed from his Coronation-oath; for our Law saith, He is as much King before he is crowned, as he is afterwards; And there is a natural allegiance due to him from the Subjects immediately upon the descent of the Crown upon him. I was in great hopes that you would have offered something in answer to one of my Lord of Elly's reasons against that part of the vote, which declares, The throne to be vacant, viz. That no act of the King's alone can bar, or destroy, the right of his heir to the Crown, which is hereditary, and not elective. (*)

R.E.M. (8). The Earl of Clarendon begins with representing the Original Contract between King and people, as an imaginary thing. And yet he owns the King is bound by Law, (though he cites none) and bound to perform, &c. But that this obligation proceeds not from his Coronation-oath. What is it then that binds him?

"And then, if this matter goes no farther than King James the Second, in his own person; How comes the Vacancy and the Supply to be devolved upon the people? For if he only be set aside, then it is apparent, where the Crown is to go, to the person that hath the next Right of Succession, and consequently there is no Vacancy. (9)."

R.E.M. (9). The Lords always spoke of the next heir, but without naming the Prince of Wales. The reason is, that by raising, as they thought, invincible obstacles to the election of a new King, they designed by degrees to lead the Commons to propole the examination of the Prince of Wales's birth. But the managers for the Commons carefully avoided that snare, and therefore the Prince of Wales was not so much as once mentioned by name in the Conference.

The Earl of Nottingham added, — "The Lords having declared that they are willing, to secure the nation against the return of King James into this Kingdom; and will therefore concur with the Commons in any act that shall be thought necessary to prevent such his return, it should seem we were agreed in that matter; and if that were the point, we should find words proper soon enough to express our meaning by. But I find neither of the words, Abdicated or Dejected will, on the one side or on the other, be allowed to signify this meaning. Therefore we should come presently to think of some other that would. But the reasons why my Lords did chiefly insist upon the alteration of the word Abdicated, was, Because they did apprehend, that it being a word not known to our Laws, there might be other Inferences drawn from it than they do apprehend our Laws will warrant, from the case, as it is stated in the fact of this vote; and, as they conceive, is done in the concluding of the throne's being vacant. Therefore, I think it would shorten the present debate, if we did settle the point of the Vacancy first. For if we were sure that the throne were, or were not vacant, we should easily light upon what word were proper to be used in this case."

Sir George Treby speaking on the side of the Commons said, — "I think, my Lords the present debate is to begin, where the difference between the two Houses doth begin, and that is at the word Abdicated. Original Contract, is a phrase and thing used by the learned Mr. Hobbes, in his book of Ecclesiastical Polity. But I have a greater authority than this, and that is your Lordships own, who have agreed to all the vote, but this word Abdicated, and the Vacancy of the Throne. But it is very much beyond what the vote before us doth lead us unto, To talk of the right of those in the succession: For that goes farther than the very last part of our vote; and it is still to lead us yet farther, to say any thing about making the Crown Elective." Then he endeavoured to prove that King James had actually Abdicated the Kingdom, alledging the authority of Grotius, who says, That if there be any word or action that doth sufficiently manifest the intention of the mind and will, to part with his office; that will amount to an Abdicacion or renouncing. Now (added he) I beg leave to put this case, That had King James the Second come here into the assembly of Lords and Commons, and expressed himself in "writings, or words, to this purpose." I was born an heir to the Crown of England, which is a Government limited by Laws, made in full Parliament, by King, Nobles, and Commonalty; and, upon the death of my last predecessors, I am in possession of the throne; and, now I find, I cannot make Laws without the consent of the Lords and Representatives of the Commons in Parliament; I cannot suspend Laws that have been so made, without the consent of my People; this indeed is the title of Kingship I hold by Original Contract, and the fundamental Constitutions of the Government; and my succession to, and possession of the Crown, on these terms, is part of that Contract; this part of the Contract I am weary of, I do renounce it, I will not be obliged to observe it; nay, I am under an obligation not to comply with it; I will not execute the Laws that have been made; nor suffer others to be made, as my People shall desire, for their security in Religion, Liberty, and Property, which are the two main parts of the Kingly office in this nation. "I say, suppose he had so expressed himself, doubtless, this had been a plain renouncing of the legal regular Title which came to him by descent: If then he, by particular acts, such as are enumerated in the vote, has declared as much, or more than these words can amount to, then he hath thereby declared his will to renounce the Government. — And this doth amount to a manifest declaration of his will, no longer to retain the exercise of his Kingly office according to Law, he has sufficiently declared his renouncing of the very office, and therefore I cannot depart from insisting upon the word Abdicated, which doth so well correspond to the fact of the case, and so well expresses the true meaning of the Commons in their vote."

The Earl of Nottingham said, — "I will not undertake to dispute, whether a King of England may, or may not, renounce his Kingdom. For my own part, I think he can, and I may go so far in agreement with those that have spoken to this point, To yield that he may do it by implicit act, contrary to the Kingly office. For a King to say, he will not govern according to law; and for a King to act wholly contrary to law, and do that which would subvert the Constitution, is 1689. " (I think) the same thing. But then I must say also, that I think there is a difference between saying so, and doing something inconsistent with what the Laws require; for every deviation from the Law, is a kind of breach of the fundamental Constitution; as the Laws are necessary, so far as to support the foundation. But if every transgression, or violation of the Law, by the Prince's connivance or command, were such a breach of the fundamental laws, as would infer an Abdication, then were it in vain to call any of his Ministers or Officers to account for any such action. Then the action is the King's, and not theirs; and then adieu to the maxim of, A King's not doing wrong. I take this matter to be so plain, as to the distinction that I have mentioned, that nothing can be more; and it has been thought so essentially necessary to have it clear and manifest, that those two great instances of Edward II. and Richard II. were express de jure renunciations, and those confirmed in Parliament by the Lords and Commons, by the act of deposing them. Therefore I cannot infer from the facts enumerated in the vote, that this should be an Abdication for himself and his heirs."

St. George Treby replied—"When a King breaks the Law in some few particular instances, it may be sufficient to take an account of it from those evil ministers that were instrumental in it, why such a thing was done, which was against the laws? Why such a law was not executed by them, whose duty it was to see it put in execution? You may, in ordinary cases of breaking the Law, have remedy in the ordinary Courts and course of Justice. But sure! he does not take this to be such a case, or these to be ordinary violations of the Law: And therefore, in the extraordinary cases, the extraordinary remedy is to be resorted unto. And where shall any man come to have any redress in such a case as this, when the malefactor comes to be party, unto whom all applications for relief and redress from injuries should be made, and so he himself shall be a judge of his own breaches of Law. This most apparently was the case as to the Quo Warranto, which was a plain Design to subvert the Constitution in the very foundation of the legislature. It is because the King hath violated the Constitution, by which the Law stands, as the rule both of the Kingly Government, and the People's obedience, that we say, he hath Abdicated and Renounced the Government; for all other particular breaches of the Law, the Subject may have remedy in the ordinary Courts of Justice, or the extraordinary Court of Parliamentary proceedings: But where such an attempt as this is made on the essence of the Constitution, it is not we that have brought our selves into this state of nature, but those who have reduced our legal well-established frame of Government into such a state of confusion, as we are now seeking a redress unto."

The Lords objecting nothing farther against the use of the word Abdicated, the Commons proceeded to the second amendment; namely, the leaving out the words, And that the Throne is thereby vacant. Mr. Sacheverell opened the debate, and said,—"My Lords, the Commons, in using the words Abdication and Vacancy, had no thoughts of making the Kingdom elective, neither can any such thing be deduced from their words." (10.)

RE.M. (10.) As the principal reason which induced the Lords to oppose the Commons vote, was, the consequence drawn from thence, that the Crown would thereby become elective, the Commons were very careful to deny this consequence, by saying, That not only they had no such thought, but that it could not be inferred from their vote. This was a material point. For if the Lords could have drawn from the Commons a confession, that the consequence was just, they would have pretended, that by declaring the Throne vacant, the Constitution was subverted, and the Crown made elective instead of hereditary. It seems, that the Commons might have denied that the Crown was originally hereditary, and maintained, it was so only by the Statutes made in the reigns of Elizabeth and James I. From whence they might have inferred, that the Parliament which settled the Crown upon the descendants of James I. in the direct, and afterwards in the collateral line, had likewise power to alter the order of the settlement. But they avoided all discussions of this nature, being sensible, that the design of the Lords was to multiply the subjects of dispute, in order to increase the obstacles of the projected establishment.

Mr. Sacheverell continued, "The Commons reason for their disagreeing to this amendment, was, because they conceive (that as they may well infer) from so much of their own vote, as your Lordships have agreed unto, That King James the Second hath Abdicated the Government; and that the Throne is thereby vacant: So, if they should admit your Lordships amendments, That he hath only Deserted the Government; yet, even thence would follow, It is vacant, as to King James the Second: Deserting the Government being, in true construction, Deserting the Throne. If King James had only given over the exercise of the Government, [as their Lordships pretended] he continues in the office, and is King still; and then all the acts that we have done in this Convention, are wholly (as we conceive) not justifiable, you are in no place or station to relieve your selves, or the nation, in this exigence; unless you will think of setting up another Regency by your own authority, without his consent; which, I conceive, by the laws of England, you cannot do. What then follows upon all we have done? We have drawn the nation into a snare, by the steps we have taken; and leave all in such an intricacy, as we have no power by law to deliver them out of; nor can we answer for what we have done, unless the King should die, and that would leave the succession uncertain."

Mr. Pollexfen pursuing the same argument, maintained, "That the Lords saying in their vote, That the Government was Deserted, could not mean only the exercise of it, but a vacancy: The King's power, and the exercise of that power, was, in construction of the law, one and the same, and so joined, that they could not be severed; and therefore, the supposed distinction was only notional, and altogether disagreeing to the laws of England. That it was utterly unlawful, and as great a crime to take away from the King the exercise of the Government, as to take from him the Government; it might do well for their Lordships to consider, whether they were not guilty of the same crime, which they would decline by their amendment. That the Commons therefore could not admit, That there should be a taking away the exercise of the Government from the King, any more than the taking away the Government, which, the Commons said, he had himself given away by Abdication; and that if King James was King still, they could not by any means agree to the keeping him out of the Kingdom. That to have a Regency upon King James without his own consent, or till his return, while the right was still in him, would be a strange and impracticable thing, and introductive of a Commonwealth, instead of the antient Government by a limited monarchy; and that the conclusion, That such a vacancy in the Throne would make the Crown elective, had no premises either from their actions, their sayings, or their votes, or any thing else in that case. (11.)

RE.M. (11.) The Lords answered but weakly Mr. Pollexfen's reasons. Several of those who were against a vacancy verily believed, it was as unlawful to deprive King James of the exercise of the regal power, as of the power itself. But they durst not directly undertake his defence, because they knew his person was odious to the whole nation. Wherefore, they had devised this distinction between a Right, and the exercise of that Right, to leave room for his restoration. Mr. Pollexfen, as appears, maintains, that this distinction is imaginary. Let the reader examine, whether it was well proved, or only supposed; or whether, in supposition of its reality, it was applicable to the point in hand.

The Earl of Clarendon interposed, and said, "He would not declare his opinion about the vacancy as to King James, but desired to know the meaning of the Commons, how far the vacancy was to extend?"

This gave occasion to Mr. Pollexfen to ask the Lords, Whether their Lordships did agree, That the Throne was vacant as to King James the Second? That if so, or if they should say it was full of any body else, and would name whom it was full of, it would then be time for the Commons to give an answer."

To which, the same Earl replied, "That admitting, for discourse sake, that the Throne was vacant as to King James the Second, it must then be supplied by those that should have come if he were dead; this Government being, by all our laws, an hereditary Monarchy, which is to go in succession by inheritance in the royal line. That if the Commons said this Government was vacant, that would be to put all those by, that should take it by succession, which would make the Kingdom elective for that time: That the Lords said, there was no vacancy; but since the Commons said, The Throne was vacant, he might very well ask, Who had the right of filling up that vacancy?"

Mr. Serjeant Maynard answered, "That was not the question before them, though it would come properly in debate, when they were agreed upon the vacancy; that he granted the English Monarchy to be hereditary; but though it should in an ordinary way descend to the heir, yet as their case was, they had a maxim in law as certain as any other, which stopp'd the course; for, said he, no man

1689. "man can pretend to be King James's heir while he is living: Nemo est heres viventis." (12.)

R.E.M. (12.) Mr. Serjeant Maynard seems to have justly remarked, that it was proper to agree upon the vacancy before they proceeded to the question, Who should fill the Throne? Otherwise the consequence would be examined before the premises were settled, on which it was founded.

The Earl of Pembroke replied, "That to that point the Lord Clarendon had given an answer, That it should go to the next heir in the line, that was to take it if the King were dead. And that as they should be understood, they should make it a case of demise of the King's, as the law calls it; that is, that the King was dead in law, by his Abdication or Defection. That to answer the question of the Commons, Who the Throne was full of?

"It was sufficient to know, that there were heirs who were to take by lineal succession, though they did not, nor could not, positively name the particular person." (13.)

R.E.M. (13.) If the Lords had gained this point, that in case the Throne were vacant with regard to the person of King James only, it should be filled by the next heir, they would have thereby engaged the Commons in a discussion of the Prince of Wales's birth, wherein they would have had great advantages. But the Commons desired, above all things, to avoid this examination, into which the Lords would have artfully drawn them.

The Earl of Nottingham argued, "That if the Lords should grant a vacancy as to the King himself, yet they might justly do those acts mentioned in the Commons reasons; for if barely the exercise of the Government were Deferred, there must be a supply of that exercise in some person's taking the Administration; and as none so fit, because of the Prince's relation to the Crown, and in his presence here, to address unto about it, so none so proper to make that address as the Lords; since in the absence of the King, they were the King and Kingdom's Great Council, and might have done by themselves without the Commons; but being met in a full representative Body, they joined with them." (14.)

R.E.M. (14.) This concerns only the vindication of the Lords conduct, which had been a little censured by Mr. Sacheverell and Mr. Pollexfen. This vindication is wholly founded upon the distinction between a right, and the exercise of that right, which the Earl of Nottingham supposes, without undertaking to prove it.

"They were told, *That the next heir in succession could not take it, because no one could be heir to one alive; yet still he thought the answer given by the Lords a very good one, That though the King was not dead naturally, yet if, as they inferred, he was so civilly, the next of course ought to come in by hereditary succession; for he knew not any distinction between successors in the case of a natural death, and those in case of a civil one: That he would know, if the next heir should be set aside, and another put in, Whether that King of England should be King to him and his heirs, and so being once upon the Throne, the antient lineal succession be altered, which indeed would sufficiently make the Kingdom elective, by taking it from the right heir? That if it was not so, then he asked, Whether such a King as should be put in, should be King only during King James's life? That, he supposed, was not the meaning of the Commons; but at least, he must be made a King during his own life; that then if there was a distinction made as to the succession, between a natural and a civil death, if King James should die during the life of the new King, what would become of the hereditary Monarchy? Where must the successor come in, when the next heir to King James might not be the present heir to the present successor? That therefore they must reduce all to this point, Whether this would not make the Kingdom elective? That if they made it once elective, it was enough to make it ever so; for he would be bold to say, They could not make a stronger tie to observe that kind of succession, than what lay upon them to preserve it in this case."*

He added, "That if the Throne was vacant, he would know whether they were obliged to fill it? That if they were, they must fill it either by the old Laws, or by the humour of those who were to chuse. That if they filled it by the old Laws, they declared it was an Hereditary Kingdom, and they were to take the next Successor, to whom the succession would belong, and there would be no need of standing upon a vacancy: That if they were to fill it according to the humour of the times, that diverted the course of inheritance; and that he could not see by what authority they could do that, or change the antient constitution, without committing the same fault they had laid upon the King. But, said he, if you please to suppose the Throne vacant as to King James, that is, That he has no right, then let us go on to the next step." (15.)

R.E.M. (15.) The Earl of Nottingham enumerates here all the inconveniences, difficulties, and contrarieties to the Law which could arise from the Common's vote, and all ended in the danger of rendering the Crown elective. But he took care not to mention the difficulties which flowed from the Lord's opinion. The consequences of their opinion were, either that the Kingdom should be left in its present confusion, or King James recalled, or the Prince of Wales acknowledged for King. In all three, the danger was as great as in running the hazard of making the Crown elective, which was the only danger the Earl would have to be considered. As if the danger of leaving the Kingdom in confusion, of recalling the King, of owning a Prince who was by most people thought supposititious, who was absent and a minor, who would be bred in France in the Catholic Religion, and from whom the same inconveniences as had caused King James to be rejected, were to be feared when he should be of age: As if, I say, all these dangers were to be reckoned as nothing in comparison of the hazard of a breach in the lineal succession. Besides, it was only by way of consequence that the Lords pretended that the Crown would become elective by this breach, though the Commons affirmed they had no such intention.

But Mr. Sacheverell replied, "That all their business was to maintain, That the Throne was vacant."

And Mr. Sommes added, "That the Lords alledged as a reason against the word Abdicate, That it was not a word known to our common Laws, but that the word vacant could not have that objection made to it, since it was in our records, and even applied in a parallel case to this in the first of Henry IV."

To which the Earl of Rocheſter answered, "That as that was the only precedent for the word vacant, yet it was attended with this very consequence, that it would make the Monarchy elective; for it being there declared, That the royal seat was vacant, immediately did follow an election of Henry IV., who was not next in the royal line."

The same argument was pursued by the Earl of Clarendon, who said, "That it was plain in the case of Richard II., who had absolutely Relinquished, Renounced, or Abdicated in writing under his own hand; that after that, the Parliament being sitting, they did not think that sufficient to go upon, because that writing might be the effect of fear, and not voluntary: That thereupon they proceeded to a formal deposition upon articles; and then came in the claim of Henry IV.: That that was undoubtedly an Election; though he was really the next Heir, the Earl of March not appearing, Henry claimed it as his undoubted right being the next heir that appeared: That all the Kings that were thus taken in or elected, (for the election was not of God's approbation) any one year scarce passed in any of their Reigns, without being disturbed in the possession: That Henry IV. did not care to owe the Crown to the election, but claimed it as his right; that it was a plausible pretence, and kept him and his son upon the Throne; but in the time of his Grandson Henry VI., there was an utter overthrow of his title and possession too: For in the first of Edward IV., all the proceedings against Richard II., as well as all the rest of the Acts during the usurpation (as that record rightly calls it) were annulled, repealed, revoked and reversed, and all imaginable words used to set those proceedings aside, as illegal, unjust and unrighteous: That that act deduced the pedigree of the royal line from Henry III. to Richard II., who died without issue; and then Henry IV., says the Act, usurped; but that the Earl of March, upon the death of Richard II., and consequently Edward IV. from him was undoubted King by conscience, by nature, by custom, and by law." (16.)

R.E.M. (16.) All the arguments from the Acts of Parliament relating to the differences between the Houses of Lancaster and York, must be very weak. Because these Parliaments did not all proceed upon the same principle, and because the one pulled down what the other set up. This evidently appears, in that both sides in the present case, alledged some of the Acts of these Parliaments, in support of their cause.

Hereupon Sir Robert Howard exerted himself, and replied, "He would not say that the record of Henry IV. was not a precedent of election; for the Parliament did not much mind his claim, knowing that he claimed by descent, where there was a person that had a title before him: Thus the Commons did not doubt but that power which brought in another line then, upon the vacancy of the Throne by the lesion of Richard II., was still, according to the Constitution, residing in the Lords and Commons, and was legally sufficient to supply the present vacancy: That he would ask the question of any Lord there, whether, had there been an heir to whom the Crown had quietly descended in the line of succession, and this heir certainly known, their Lordships would

"would have assemlbled without his calling, or would have either admitted the Government themselves, or advised the Prince of Orange to have taken it upon himself? That he doubted they had been all guilty of high treason by the laws of England, if a known successor of the Throne were in possession of the Throne, as he must be if the Throne were not vacant: That from hence their Lordships saw, that the difficulty in this matter arose from this, That they would all agree the Throne to be vacant, when they knew of none that possessed it; that some such thing had been pretended to as an heir-male, of which there were different opinions, and in the mean time they were without a Government. Must we stay, added he, till the truth of the matter be found out? What shall be done to preserve our constitution, and in a little time it will, perhaps, through the distraction of our constitution, be utterly irretrievable. He contended it would be a difficult thing to go upon the examination who was heir, or else their Lordships would have explained themselves before. But, continued he, it not being clear, must we always remain thus? Use what words you will, fill up, or nominate, or elect, it is the thing that we are to take care of, and it is high time it was done. There is no such consequence to be drawn from this vote, as an intention or likelihood of altering the course of the Government, so as to make it elective; the Throne has all along descended in an hereditary succession, the main constitution has been preserved. The precedent of Henry IV. is not like that of elections in other countries; and I am sorry there should be any occasion for what is necessary to be done now; but when such difficulties are upon the nation, that we cannot extricate our selves out of, as to the lineal successor, your Lordships, I hope, will give us leave to remember, Salus populi est suprema lex. And if neither you nor we can do any thing in this case, we, who are met under the notion of a Convention of the States, have then met to no purpose; for after we have voted our selves to be without Government (which looks as if something were really intended as to a settlement) all presently sinks, and we are as much in the dark as we were before. Your Lordships say, you will never make a precedent of Election, or take upon you to alter the succession. With your Lordship's favour the settlement of the constitution is the main thing we are to look after. If you provide for the supply of the defect there, that Point of the succession will, without all question, in the same method, and at the same time, be surely provided for. But, my Lords, have not you your selves limited the very succession, and cut off some that might have a lineal right? Have you not concurred with us in our vote, That it is inconsistent with our Religion and Laws to have a Papist to reign over us? Must we not come then to an election, if the next heir be a Papist? Nay, suppose there was no Protestant heir at all to be found, would not your Lordships then break the line? If your Lordships then in such a case must break through the succession, I think the nation has reason to expect you should take care to supply the present defect, where the succession is uncertain; or what can we do further, but even part in confusion, and so leave the nation to extricate itself as well as it can out of its distraction. But even at whose doors that will lie, I must leave to your Lordships own thoughts."

It is said this Speech, wherein good sense, and a zeal for the nation equally shined, made a deep impression upon some of the Lords who assisted at the conference, and upon all the rest of the audience. However, as the Earl of Clarendon, to prove the lineal succession, had alledged what passed with regard to Edward IV. Sir George Treby undertook to explain that matter, and said:

"That it was very well known, that Edward IV. came in disaffirmance of the title of the House of Lancaster: That as those times went, whenever there was a turn in Government, as there were several, there were new and contrary declarations about the title to the Crown, made constantly in Parliament; and what one Parliament settled, another undid: But then, that this advantage the Commons had on their side; that as they had this first precedent for them, so they had the last, viz. The Parliament-Roll of the first of Henry VII. where the Record is set right again: That the act for deposing Richard II. was indeed repealed by the first of Edward IV. and thereupon it proceeds to attain Henry VI.; but then came in Henry VII. in the first year of whose reign there was an act made, that set aside all the acts and attainders made against his line, and consequently it repealed the first of Edward IV. which had repealed the first of Henry IV.: That Henry VII. was of the line of Lancaster, and though he had the heirs of the House of York in his bosom, yet after he came to the throne, he would not endure to have his Crown reckoned on.

Here the Earl of Nottingham once more interposed and "He could not imagine how a King
"hereditary, and that the King who had children in being "at the time of his forsaking the Government, could have "the throne vacant, both of him and his children; that
"the course of inheritance, as to the Crown of England, "was by law a great deal better provided for, than that of "any other inheritance, That an attainder of the heir of a

"which was declared by several Acts of Parliament,
"and very fully and particularly by the twenty-fifth
"of Henry VIII. — That he desired to know, "whether the Lords and Commons had power by themselves "to make a binding act or law? And whether, according to "the legal Constitution, every King of England, by being seated on the throne, and possessed of the "Crown, was not thereby King to him and his heirs?
"And that without an act of Parliament he knew not what "was urged indeed, that the Lords had in effect already

"should have its effect, he desired that every thing of that "nature might be done in the ancient usual method of Parliament.
"That since they were happily delivered from the fears of Popery
"and arbitrary power, God forbid they should assume any such power to themselves; for what "advantage should they then give to those who would quarrel "with their settlement for the illegality of it?
"Would not this, which they endeavour to crush, break "forth into a viper? That in all the breaches that were "made upon the line of Succession, such was the force of the "Laws, that the usurpers would not take the Crown upon them,
"unless they had some specious pretence of an hereditary title to it.
"That what he would have used by all means, was the mischievous consequences that he "feared would ensue upon the vacancy of the throne, namely,
"the utter overthrow of the whole Constitution;

1689.

"for if the Lords and Commons only remained as parts of the Government, and if the head be taken away, and the throne vacant, by what Laws or Constitutions was it that they retained Lords and Commons? That they were knit together in their common head; and that if one part of the Government was dissolved, he saw not any reason but that all must be dissolved. He confessed, that any Government was better than none; but he earnestly desired they might enjoy their ancient Constitution." (17.)

REM. (17.) The Earl of Nottingham, in his Speech, reasoned like Charles I, in his disputes with the Parliament. That is, he supposed the Government in its natural state, and on that supposition, his arguments were strong. But it is hard to conceive a greater disorder in the Government than at the time of this conference. King James had reigned three years in an arbitrary manner. He had violated, not some particular laws of little moment, but fundamental Laws, whereon the security of the national Religion and Liberties depended. After which, he had withdrawn himself out of the Kingdom, without taking any order about the Government. Most men thought his son supposititious, and he had sent him into France. Could the Government therefore be supposed in a natural state? And if it was not, the reasoning built upon such a supposition, ought to fall to the ground. However express the Laws may be, they always suppose some certain Constitution of Government. But if this Constitution is broke, as may happen in all countries under the sun, How, in order to remedy this evil, can the Laws be taken for rule, which suppose the Government in its usual and natural state, and which have not provided for extraordinary unforeseen cases?

What the Earl of Nottingham would intimate, though he does not speak plainly, is briefly this: The Lords and Commons are but two of the branches of the Government, and can make no Law without the third, that is, the King who is their head. The King has absented himself. He must therefore be recalled, or waited for till he returns, or else his next heir must be owned for King. Now this heir is the Prince of Wales. This is evident from the care that was taken not to name him. Or if none of these methods be followed, the Kingdom must be left in a state of anarchy, or a Regent appointed to govern in the King's name, during his absence.

The whole debate was closed with two short Speeches made by Mr. Paul Foley, and Mr. Byre. The former said, "He hoped there was no danger of shaking our fundamentals in this case; that they were pursuing those methods which agreed with our Laws and Constitution; for though the Monarchy of this nation be hereditary in the ordinary course of Succession, yet there might fall out a case wherein that could not be complied with, and a plain vacancy might ensue. For, said he, put the case the whole legal line should fall, should we in that case have no Government at all? And who then should we have but Lords and Commons? And I think that comes nearest to the case in question, where the successor is not known; for if he had been, we should have heard of him before now. And what is the reason that it should then in the former case devolve to the Lords and Commons, but that there is no King? And they being the representative body of the Kingdom, are the only remaining apparent parts of the Government, and are only to supply the defect by providing a Successor?"

Mr. Byre subjoined, "That they were led out of the way, hunting after the consequences of a vote not yet agreed unto; That they had made a right and apt conclusion from the premises, otherwise all the vote was but historical: We declare, adds he, That the late King James has broke the Original Contract, has violated the fundamental Laws, and has withdrawn himself out of the Kingdom, that he has Abdicated the Government. What occasion was there for such a declaration as this, if nothing were concluded from it? That were only to give the Kingdom a compendious history of those miseries they have too well learned by feeling them. Therefore there was a necessity to make some conclusion; and none so natural as this; that we are left without a King, that the throne is thereby vacant, which it may be as to the possession, and yet the right of Succession no ways prejudiced. But, my Lords, we are come here by the Commands of the House of Commons, to declare the reasons of their vote, and your amendments, not to dispute what will be the consequences, which is not at present our Province." And here ended this famous Conference.

During all these debates in the Convention, the Prince of Orange staid at St. James's, without taking the least pains to gain any one person to his party. He was never less affable, being desirous to shew by his behaviour, that his intention was not to deprive any man of the liberty to vote as he should think fit. The two Houses were surprized that no body spoke to them in the Prince's behalf. At last, finding that his silence might be ill construed, as if he was unwilling to take upon him the burden of Royalty, he sent for the Marquis of Halifax, the Earls of Danby, Shrewsbury, and some others, and told them:

"He had been till then silent, because he would not say or do any thing that might seem in any sort to take from any person the full freedom of deliberating and voting in matters of such importance: He was resolved neither to court nor threaten any one. Some were for putting the Government in the hands of a Regent: He would say nothing against it, if it was thought the best mean for settling their affairs: Only he thought it necessary to tell them, that he would not be the Regent: So, if they continued in that design, they must look out for some other person to be put in that post: He himself saw what the consequences of it were like to prove: So he would not accept of it. Others were for putting the Princess singly on the throne, and that he should reign by her courtly: He said, no man could esteem a woman more than he did the Princess; but he was so made, that he could not think of holding any thing by apron-strings: Nor could he think it reasonable to have any share in the Government, unless it was put in his person, and that for term of life: If they did think it fit to settle it otherwise, he would not oppose them in it: But he would go back to Holland, and meddle no more in their affairs: He assured them, that whatsoever others might think of a Crown, it was no such thing in his eyes, but that he could live very well, and be well pleased without it: In the end he said, he could not resolve to accept of a dignity, so as to hold it only the life of another: Yet he thought that the issue of the Princess Ann should be preferred in the Succession, to any issue he might have by any other wife than the Princess."

This declaration being immediately divulged by those it was made to, did not a little contribute to bring the debates in the House of Lords, to a speedy determination. As for the Commons, about two thirds were for the Prince.

When the report of the Conference between the two Houses was made to the Lords, there was a very warm debate, whether they should insist upon the amendments. During the debate, it was moved, that the birth of the Prince of Wales might be examined into. But this motion was at length rejected for several reasons: 1. The Prince of Wales was now sent out of England to be bred up in France, an enemy both to the nation and the established Religion. What therefore would such an examination signify? 2. It was impossible for the people of England to know, whether he was the same person that had been carried over or not. 3. In case he should die, another might be put in his room, in such manner, that the nation could not be sure concerning him. 4. The English nation ought not to send into another country for witnesses to prove that he was their Prince, much less receive one upon the testimony of such as were not only aliens, but ought to be presumed enemies. 5. It was known, that all the persons who had been the confidants in that matter, were conveyed away; so it was impossible to come at them, by whose means only the truth of that birth could be found out. It is pretended, there were some who thought it a deep piece of policy, to let the Prince of Wales's title remain undecided, in order to deter the succeeding Kings from imitating King James (1).

At length, after a long debate, the majority of the Lords departed from their two amendments, and agreed with the vote of the Commons, That King James had Abdicated the Government, and that the Throne was thereby become vacant. Very likely, they who deserted the party of the Earls of Nottingham, Clarendon, and Rochester, considered, that the suggested danger of the Crown's becoming elective, was not to be compared to that which must necessarily happen, if the Kingdom was left in the present confusion, or King James recalled, or the Prince of Wales acknowledged for King. It is said however, that the scale was turned to this side, by the arrival of some Lords, who were not present in the House when the two amendments were voted: but they are not named. It is hardly probable that the pretended arrival of these Lords should have occasioned the change in the House of Peers. There must have been a dozen at least, and all of the same side, which is not very likely.

This great step being made, the next thing to be debated was, who should fill the vacant Throne. The Marquis of Halifax moved, That the Crown should be given to the Prince of Orange alone, and to the two Princesses after his death. But he was not seconded (1). If Dr. Burnet Bishop of Salisbury is to be credited, Bentinck (2), the Prince's favorite and confident, strenuously supported this proposal. The debate upon this affair was very long. It was readily agreed, that the Princesses of Orange should be placed on the Throne; but the question was, whether the Prince should be King of himself, or as husband of the Princess? Upon this, parties began to be formed in both Houses. Mean while, as the Princesses were detained in Holland by the frost, and by contrary winds after the thaw, the Earl of Danby sent one over to the Princesses, with an account of the present state of the debate, and to tell her, that if she desired it, he did not doubt but he should be able to carry it, for setting her alone on the Throne. The Princesses answered, She was the Prince's wife, and would never be other than what she should be in conjunction with him, and under him. Adding, she would take it very ill, if any, under a pretence of their care for her, would set up a divided interest between her and the Prince. Not content with this, she sent the Lord Danby's letter [and her answer] to the Prince, and thereby broke all the measures of those, who wished to create a misunderstanding or jealousy between them. The Earl of Danby received not the least mark of displeasure from the Prince of Orange, who continued still to employ and trust him.

(1) Thornet says, that when this matter was debated in private, some observed, that as King James by giving up to prove the truth of the Birth, and a right of Succession, had made it more suspicious than it was before, for, if there was no clear and positive proof made of an imposture, pretending to examine into it, and then the act being able to make it out beyond the possibility of Contradiction, would still preserve the pretension of his Birth, p. 817.

At last, both Houses agreed, and voted severally, that the Prince and Princesses of Orange should be King and Queen of England, but that the sole and full legal power should be in the Prince only, in the name of both. However, this was carried in the House of Lords but by two or three voices only, and not without a protestation entered against it by the contrary party (3).

The last debate in the Convention, was, concerning the oaths that should be taken to the King and Queen. To avoid all cavils upon the terms, [rightful and lawful King] in the usual oath, it was thought proper to reduce the oath to the ancient simplicity of swearing, to bear faith and true allegiance to the King and Queen. Hence arose the famous distinction of a King de facto, and a King de jure, some pretending, that they took the oath to the King and Queen, only as King and Queen de facto, whom they were bound to obey no longer than they continued in quiet possession; but that it was lawful for them to assist King James, if he should come to recover his Crown, as being still their King de jure. This distinction proceeded chiefly from the Clergy, who had so far entangled themselves with those strange conceits of the divine right of Monarchy, and had so engaged themselves by publicly preaching Passive-obedience and Non-resistance, as an essential doctrine of the Church of England, that they did not know how to disengage themselves from the snare they themselves had laid, at a time, when they little thought of being ever taken in it.

At length, on the 12th of February, the Princesses of Orange arrived at London, and seemed very well pleased with what had been resolved, that the administration of the Government should be in the Prince only, in the name of both. Thus the strict union between the Prince and Princesses broke the measures of such as hoped to create a misunderstanding between them, in order to serve their old master.

The next day, the Prince and Princesses of Orange being seated on two large chairs, under a canopy of State in the great Hall, both Houses of the Convention waited upon them in a full body, to offer them the Crown. But before they proceeded to this solemn offer, they caused the Clerk of the Crown to read the following Declaration of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons assembled at Westminster.

"WHEREAS the late King James the Second, by the assistance of divers evil Counsellors, Judges, and Ministers employed by him, did endeavour to subvert and extirpate the Protestant Religion, and the Laws and Liberties of this Kingdom; by assuming and exercising a power of dispensing with, and suspending of laws, and the execution of laws, without consent of Parliament: By committing and prosecuting divers worthy Prelates, for humbly petitioning to be excused from concurring to the said assumed power: By issuing and causing to be executed, a commission under the Great Seal, for erecting a Court, called, The Court of Commissioners for ecclesiastical causes: By levying money for and to the use of the Crown, by pretence of Prerogative, for other time, and in other manner, than the same was granted by Parliament: By raising and keeping a standing army within this Kingdom in time of peace, without consent of Parliament; and quartering soldiers contrary to law: By causing several good subjects, being Protestants to be disfamed, at the same time, when Papists were both armed and employed contrary to law: By violating the freedom of election of Members to serve in Parliament: By prosecutions in the Court of King's Bench for matters and causes cognizable only in Parliament; and by divers other arbitrary and illegal courses. And whereas of late years, partial, corrupt, and unqualified persons, have been returned and served on Juries in trials, and particularly divers Jurors in trials for High Treason, which were not Freeholders; and excessive bail hath been required of persons committed in criminal cases, to elude the benefit of the laws made for liberty of the subjects; and excessive fines have been imposed; and illegal and cruel punishments inflicted; and several grants and promises made of fines and forfeitures, before any conviction or judgment against the persons upon whom the same were to be levied. All which are utterly and directly contrary to the known laws and statutes, and freedom of this realm.

And whereas the said late King James the Second, having Abdicated the Government, and the Throne being thereby vacant, his Highness the Prince of Orange (whom it hath pleased Almighty God to make the glorious instrument of delivering this Kingdom from Popery and arbitrary Power) did, (by the advice of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and divers principal persons of the Commons) cause letters to be written to the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, being Protestants, and other letters to the several Counties, Cities, Universities, Boroughs, and Cinque-Ports, for the choosing of such persons to represent them, as were of right to be sent to Parliament, to meet and sit at Westminster, upon the 22d day of January, in this year 1688, in order to such an establishment, as that their Religion, Laws, and Liberties, might not again be in danger of being subverted. Upon which letters, elections having been accordingly made; and thereupon the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, pursuant to their respective letters and elections, being now assembled in a full and free Representative of this nation, taking into their most serious consideration the best means for attaining the ends aforesaid, do, in the first place (as their ancestors in like case have usually done) for the vindicating and asserting their ancient Rights and Liberties; declare,

1. That the pretended power of suspending of laws, or execution of laws, by regal authority, without consent of Parliament, is illegal.

2. That the pretended power of dispensing with laws, or the execution of laws, by regal authority, as it hath been assumed and exercised of late, is illegal.

3. That the commission for erecting the late Court of Commissioners for ecclesiastical causes, and all other Commissions and Courts of the like nature, are illegal and pernicious.

4. That the levying of money for or to the use of the Crown, by pretence of Prerogative, without grant of Parliament, for longer time, or in any other manner than the same is, or shall be granted, is illegal.

5. That it is the right of the subjects to petition the King, and all commitments and prosecutions for such petitioning, are illegal.

6. That the raising or keeping a standing army within the Kingdom in time of peace, unless it be with consent of Parliament, is against law.

7. That the subjects, which are Protestants, may have arms for their defence, suitable to their condition, and as allowed by law.

8. That election of Members of Parliament ought to be free.

9. That the freedom of Speech, and debates or proceedings in Parliament, ought not to be impeached or questioned, in any Court or place out of Parliament.

10. That excessive bail ought not to be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted.

11. That Jurors ought to be duly empannelled and returned; and Jurors, which pass upon men in trials for High-treason, ought to be Freeholders.

12. That all grants and promises, of fines and forfeitures of particular persons, before conviction, are illegal and void.

13. And that for redress of all grievances, and for the amending, strengthening, and preserving of the laws,

(2) Burnet, p. 822, says, that things were so near an Equality in the House of Lords [one hundred and twenty being present] that it was carried by a Majority of two or three, to agree with the Commons in voting the Abolition and the Vacancy of the throne, and that the Vote by which the Prince and Princesses were declared to be King and Queen went very hard. Burnet says by twenty Voices, forty five against forty five.

1689. "Parliaments ought to be held frequently. And they do

 "misses, as their undoubted Rights, and Liberties; and that "no declarations, judgments, doings, or proceedings, to the "prejudice of the People in any of the said premisses,
 "ought in any wife to be drawn hereafter into consequence "or example. To which demand of their rights, they "are particularly encouraged by the declaration of his "Highness the Prince of Orange, as being the only means "for obtaining a full redress and remedy therein.
 "Having therefore an entire confidence, that his said
 "Highness the Prince of Orange will perfect the deliverance
 "so far advanced by him, and will still preserve them from "the violation of their rights, which they have here as"serted, and from all other attempts upon their Religion, "Rights, and Liberties; the said Lords Spiritual and Tem"poral, assembled at Westminster, do resolve, That Wil"liam and Mary, Prince and Princess of Orange, be, and "be declared KING and QUEEN of England, France,
 "and Ireland, and the dominions thereunto belonging,
 "to hold the Crown and royal Dignity of the said Kingdoms
 "and Dominions, to them the said Prince and Princesses
 "during their lives, and the life of the survivor of them;
 "and that the sole and full exercise of their regal power
 "be only in, and executed by, the said Prince of Orange,
 "in the names of the said Prince and Princesses, during "their joint lives; and after their decease, the said Crown
 "and royal Dignity of the said Kingdoms and Dominions
 "to be to the heirs of the body of the said Princess; and for "default of such issue, to the Princess Ann of Denmark, and
 "the heirs of her body; and for default of such issue,
 "to the heirs of the body of the said Prince of Orange.
 "And the said Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and "Commons, do pray the said Prince and Princesses of "Orange, to accept the same accordingly. And that the "oaths hereafter-mentioned, be taken by all persons of "whom the oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy might be "required by law instead of them; and that the said oaths
 "of Allegiance and Supremacy be abrogated:
 "I, A. B. do sincerely promise and swear, That I will "be faithful, and bear true allegiance to their Majesties, "King WILLIAM and Queen MARY. So help me God.
 "I, A. B. do swear, That I do from my heart abhor, de"test, and abjure, as impious and heretical, this damnable "doctrine and position, That Princes excommunicated or "deprived by the Pope, or any authority of the See of "Rome, may be deposed or murdered by their Subjects, "or any other whatsoever. And I do declare, That no
 "foreign Prince, Person, Prelate, State, or Potentate,
 "hath, or ought to have, any Jurisdiction, power, superio"rity, pre-eminence or authority, ecclesiastical or spiritual,
 "within this Realm. So help me God."
 After the reading of this Declaration, the Marquis of Halifax, Speaker of the House of Lords, made a solemn tender of the Crown to their Highnesses, in the name of both Houses, whereupon the Prince of Orange returned the following answer:
 My Lords and Gentlemen, This is certainly the greatest proof of the trust you have in us, that can be given, which is the thing that makes us value it the more; and we thankfully accept what you have offered. And as I had no other intention in coming hither, than to preserve your Religion, Laws, and Liberties, so you may be sure, that I shall endeavour to support them, and shall be willing to concur in any thing that shall be for the good of the Kingdom, and to do all that is in my power to advance the welfare and glory of the Nation.
 All this was followed with the acclamations of the people, which quickly flew over the whole City. The same day the Prince and Princesses were proclaimed King and Queen of England, France, and Ireland, by the names of WILLIAM and MARY, to the inexpressible joy of the People (1).

(1) I. King James the Second's Natural Issue was as follows.

1. By Mrs. Arabella Churchill, Sister of John Duke of Marlborough, afterwards married to Colonel Godfrey, he had (1.) James Fitz-James, Grandee of Spain, Marechal of France, Knight of the Golden Fleece, commonly called Duke of Berwick. Outlawed in 1695. (2.) Henry Fitz-James, commonly called the Grand Prior, born 1673. Outlawed in 1695. Lieutenant-General and Admiral of the French Gallies. He died in France, December 7, 1702. (3.) Henrietta, born 1679, who married Henry Lord Waldegrave, 1683. Father of James the present Lord Waldegrave, born in 1684.

2. By Mrs. Catherine Sedley, Daughter of Sir Charles Sedley, Baronet, created Baroness of Darlington, and Countess of Dorchester, afterwards married to Sir David Collier, the late Earl of Portmore, he had Catherine Darnley, present Dutchess Dowager of Buckingham, born 1681. She married (1.) James Annesley, Earl of Anglesey, in October 1699. By whom she had Catherine Annesley, January 7, 1701, who married William Philips, Esq. Son of Sir Constantine Philips. (2.) John Sheffield, Duke of Buckinghamshire and Normanby, March 1, 1705. By whom she had Edmund, the present Duke of Bucking-hamshire, born January 11, 1716.

II. By an Indenture in the first of James II. a Pound weight of Gold, twenty two Carats fine, and two Carats alloy, was coined into 44 l. 10 s. by tale, namely, into Ten Shillings, Twenty Shillings, and Five Pounds, pieces; and a Pound weight of Silver of the old Standard into 64 Shillings by tale, namely, into Groats, Half-Groats, Shillings, Six-pences, Groats, Two-pences, and Pence; which Standard both for Gold and Silver hath continued ever since.

The Gold Coins have on one side the King's Head laureate, IACOBVS II. DEI. GRATIA. Reverse MAG. BR. FRA. ET. HIB. ET. TVTAMEN, &c. the Half-crown is the same, and the Shilling and Six-pence the like, except the Inscription upon the Rim. The lesser Pieces, from the Groats to the Penny, have as many initial Letters of his Name crown'd, as they contain Pence, but the same Inscription as the Crown-piece. The Tin-farthing and Half-penny have the King's Head, IACOBVS. SECVNDVS. Reverse Britannia, BRITANNIA, upon the Rim 1685. NVMMORVM. FAMVLVS.

A DISSERTATION on the Rise, Progress, Views, Strength, Interests, and Characters of the two Parties of the WHIGS and TORIES. First published in the year 1717.

THOUGH the two parties or factions which divide England, have been long talked of, it is but of late years that all Europe, as I may say, is engaged in their quarrel. Before the last Peace, Foreigners generally looked upon the differences between the Whigs and the Tories, as a matter of curiosity, which no way concerned them. If any seemed to regard them, it was solely on account of the diversity of the opinions of the two parties, concerning the hierarchy or government of the Church. To this was confined the idea, which most private Foreigners formed of the English divisions. I say, private Foreigners; for Princes and their Ministers knew what influence they had in the political affairs of Europe, according as the one or the other party prevailed in the Court or Parliament of England; but as for the People, it may be said that in general, they knew not the consequence of them.

The Peace of Utrecht has opened numberless eyes, because it is clearly seen to flow from the late revolution in the Court of England, by the change of the Whig, into a Tory, Ministry. As all Europe was engaged in the war, and consequently concerned in the peace by which it was terminated, those who before only talked of the English divisions, as of a foreign affair, are but too sensible of what consequence they are to other States. From that time this matter has been reasoned and disputed upon with more warmth. In short, most Foreigners are become Whigs or Tories, according as they have believed to see in the two parties, principles agreeable or contrary to their interests. Though Whigs and Tories equally profess the Protestant Religion, and tho' their differences seem not much to concern either Protestants or Roman Catholics, it has happened, that the Papists have declared for the Tories, and the Protestants for the Whigs. The reason of this proceeding is obvious, namely, that the one have considered the Tories as men labouring to set a zealous Popish Prince on the throne of England, whilst the others have believed, that the preservation of the Protestant Religion was the sole aim of the Whigs. There is yet another motive which has determined Foreigners to side with one of the parties, that is, their inclination to France, or their fear of the ambitious designs of that Crown. In this respect the adherents of France are Tories, and her enemies Whigs. Every one therefore has made a choice, without troubling themselves, otherwise, with the differences of the two parties. This conduct in Foreigners is the less surprizing, since in England itself, many are Whigs or Tories, without having a distinct idea of the party they have embraced.

It is very strange, that hitherto the publick has not been exactly informed concerning these two parties, which, by the superiority either may have in England, are in a capacity to influence the most important affairs of Europe. It is true, we have translations of several English Books, or rather Pamphlets, upon this subject. But it is not from thence, that the true state of the affairs of the two parties can be known. These writings are published by Whigs or Tories, and consequently by persons who are necessarily prejudiced. Accordingly, there is not one but what carries evident marks of the partiality of its author. It is either written from a foreign pen, that we are to expect a fair account of this matter, tho', to speak the truth, there is no probability of it; or it is written by one who is not sufficiently informed, or are biased to one of the factions. However the author of this Dissertation, tho' a Foreigner, thinks himself qualified to give the publick a more extensive knowledge of the two parties, than many people have hitherto had. He resided a long time in England, and has, many years, diligently studied the English History. Besides, he is attached neither by inclination nor interest to any one of the Parties, and is now in a Country where he has nothing to hope or fear from either. His impartiality will evidently appear in the Dissertation it self. To give a distinct knowledge of the two parties, the author was unavoidably obliged to descend to many particulars of the English History, without which the rise and progress of these parties could not have been clearly explained. If the English think this Dissertation defective in some points, and too large in others, they are desired to remember, it was not penned for their use; that the author's aim was to confine himself to general ideas; in a word, that the things which pass for common and well-known in England, are mysteries abroad, and require a full explanation.

It will perhaps be thought strange, that the author, who was born under a Government purely monarchical, speaks in some places, so as it may be thought he approves not of such a Government. To obviate this suspicion, he desires his Readers to consider, that he could not speak pertinently of his subject, without assuming an English spirit, and conforming himself to the principles which are common in England. It is thus only that he believed he should be able to discover the strength and weakness of the two parties. All his reasonings are founded upon this principle, of the Validity of which he is perfectly convinced; That every private person is in conscience obliged quietly to submit to the Government established in the Country where he was born, or Providence has placed him. Wherefore it is his opinion, that all secret practices, all cabals, all means direct or indirect, tending to the dissolution of such Governments, are so many crimes for which the authors are responsible to God and their Superiors.

THE Government of England is of a particular kind, of which there is not the like at present in all the world. It is, however, the same which was formerly established in all the Kingdoms of Europe, formed out of the ruins of the Roman Empire. The present difference between England, and other States, in this respect, is owing to this, that the English have preserved the form of their Government ever since their settling in Great Britain; whereas in other nations, it has been lost by degrees, or extremely altered. This Government, which has so long subsisted in this island, appears, in some respects, Monarchical, in others, Republican; and yet, properly speaking, it is neither. It cannot be called purely Monarchical, since the Nobility and the People have a share in the Legislative Power jointly with the King, nor can the King impose any tax, without the people's consent. Neither is it Republican, since there is a King, who exercises the sovereign authority, who disposes, as he pleases, of all places and dignities ecclesiastical, civil, or military; and can make peace or war, without consulting his Subjects. It would be therefore in vain to pretend to describe this Government, by the usual names of Monarchy, Aristocracy, Democracy, which agree not with it. It is a mixed Government, differing from, and yet composed of, all three. The prerogatives of the Sovereign, and the privileges of the Nobles and

People, are so tempered together, that they mutually support one another. At the same time, each of the three powers, concerned in the Legislature, are insuperably obstruct the attempts of one or both the others, to render themselves independent. In short, it is very near the same form of Government, established by the Saxons in Germany, by the Franks in Gaul, by the Visigoths in Spain, by the Ostrogoths, and after them, by the Lombards in Italy. These northern nations introduced this Government into the most southern parts of Europe, when they settled there, and founded new States upon the ruins of the Roman Empire.

If, therefore, it be asked, How long this Government has been in England? I shall not scruple to answer, Ever since the Anglo-Saxons finished the conquest of that part of Great Britain, which their descendants possess to this day. It is true, a doubt may arise, whether the Commons, in the time of the Anglo-Saxons, were part of the Parliament; and I confess this point is hard to be determined. But, however, when England was divided into seven Kingdoms, English and Saxon, each of these had its King and Parliament. This last was called the Witten-Gemot, or Assembly of Wise-men; and there was also the like for the common affairs of the whole Heptarchy. This same form of Government subsisted, when the seven Kingdoms were reduced to one and the same State. The Fields of Mars [March] or of May, called since the States General in France, the Cortes in Spain, and perhaps the Diets of the German Empire, are the remains of this ancient form of Government, introduced by the northern nations, wherever they settled.

William, Duke of Normandy, surnamed the Bayard or Conqueror, having subdued England in 1066, became absolute, and established a despotic power, though, in all likelihood, he preserved the shadow of a Parliament. To secure his conquest, he transplanted many Norman, French, Breton, and Angevin families, enriching them with the lands, of which he incessantly dispossessed the English. These transplanted families multiplied greatly in a short space, and became in the end so powerful, as to make head against their Sovereigns, successors of the Conqueror. At first, they gloried in their entire dependence upon the King, who had put them in possession of their lands. Their interest required, that they should support that power by which they held all their English possessions. But when they were once firmly settled, they began to dread, that the regal power, which had enriched them, might with the same ease strip them of their estates, if the King should so please. For this reason, they wished the Government restored to the same state, as in the times of the Saxon Kings. This was the only means to avoid the inconveniences of an arbitrary power, (which might, in time to come, turn as much to their prejudice, as it had to their advantage) and to perpetuate the possession of their lands. What at first was only a bare wish, soon rose into hope, and at last into right, by the methods I shall presently speak of. To explain this fully, a large detail of the English History would be necessary, and a particular enumeration of all the causes which have contributed to put the Nobility, and afterwards the people, in possession of a right, which they did not enjoy, under the first Norman Kings. But as this detail would lead me too far, I shall content myself with a short abridgment, concerning the subject in hand.

William the Conqueror, in 1087, left the Kingdom of England to his second Son William, surnamed Rufus, in prejudice of Robert his eldest Son, who had only Normandy. Robert made some attempts to dispossess his brother of a Crown, of which he believed himself unjustly deprived. But Rufus defeated them by his address, engaging as well the Normans as the English in his interest, with promises of re-establishing the ancient Government, and reviving the Saxon Laws. He knew that both were passionately desirous of what he made them hope. By the Normans, I mean here the foreigners newly settled in England. This promise of Rufus was therefore the first foundation of their pretensions. I say the first, for the Normans had no right to demand of the King what he was pleased to promise them, and the conquered English had as little, to limit the power of their Conquerors. It is true, the English might ground their pretensions upon some general promises made them by William the Conqueror, when he received their first homages. But this Prince never pretended that they should found a right on these promises. Accordingly, he always treated England as a conquered nation. However, Rufus kept his word with neither Normans nor English.

Upon his death Henry I, his younger brother, ascended the throne in 1100, in prejudice of his eldest brother Robert, still alive. To secure his usurpation, he pursued the same course as his predecessor Rufus. He promised to restore the ancient Government, and confirmed his promise by a Charter in form, but executed it no better than his brother. However, the rights of the subject received strength from these promises, though ill performed.

Henry I, dying, Maud his Daughter, widow of the Emperor Henry IV, and wife to Jessery Plantagenet Earl of Anjou, ought to have mounted the throne; but in 1135 was defeated of her right by Stephen Earl of Boulogne, Son of the Conqueror's eldest daughter. He bound himself more strongly than his two predecessors to restore the Saxon laws, but in all appearance with as little intention to perform his engagements. At last, the great men, finding he sought pretences to evade his promises, harassed him with a war which lasted the most part of his reign. In the beginning, they called into England the Empress Maud, and her Son Henry by the Earl of Anjou; and the war ended in a treaty, which secured the Crown to Henry after Stephen's demise though he had sons.

To Stephen, in 1154 succeeded Henry II. During his Reign, and that of his eldest son Richard I, there were no contentions between the King and the Barons, for to the great men of the Kingdom were then called. But very considerable disputes arose in the reign of King John, surnamed Lackland, brother and successor of Richard I. An unhappy quarrel between this Prince and the Court of Rome, having forced him to do homage to Pope Innocent III, for his Kingdom, and bind himself to pay him tribute, this dishonorable proceeding, added to many other causes, lost him the esteem and affection of his Subjects. The Barons improving to favorable a juncture, presented to him the Charter of Henry I, which had never been executed, and resolved to oblige him to confirm it. John at first rejected it with great haughtiness, but at last compelled by his own weakness, and the united opposition of almost all the Barons, he was obliged to grant them a Charter, much more ample and advantageous to the subject, than Henry the First's, and which was called Magna Charta, or the Charter of Liberties. By this Charter, drawn as the Barons pleaded, the King's power was so curbed, that it was in a manner reduced to the same state as under the Saxon Kings before the Conquest. This Charter has been ever since the principal foundation of the rights of the Subjects. I shall not here pretend to decide a question so much above my reach, whether this foundation is very solid. It will suffice briefly to remark, by what means a concession seemingly so defective in its origin, since it was evidently extorted, changed, as I may say, its nature by the firmness of the English, and acquired an indisputable authority, though it might have been contested at first. To this end, we must see what passed afterwards with respect to this Charter.

King John who had signed it, desiring to revoke it, drew upon himself fresh misfortunes, which lasted as long as he lived. The Barons resolving to adhere to their Charter, took at last the desperate course to call in to their assistance, Lewis Son of Philip Augustus King of France, and to put him in possession of all, or the greatest part of the Kingdom. John died during the war, deprived by a foreign Prince, or rather his own Subjects, and left a son of ten years of age, little capable to maintain the quarrel. Some Lords, who had remained faithful to the late King, appointed the Earl of Pembroke Regent, during the minority of the young Prince, who was recognized by his few Adherents by the name of Henry III. in 1216.

Shortly after the face of affairs was changed by the prudent conduct of the Regent, who seeing the Barons bent to support their Charter, promised positively, it should be confirmed and executed. Upon this assurance, they deserted Prince Lewis, who was obliged to return to France.

Henry III. was no sooner out of his minority than he repealed Magna Charta, and thought of reigning uncontrolled. But as he had not a capacity equal to such an undertaking, his long Reign of fifty six years was one continued scene of troubles on account of Magna Charta. He was frequently forced to confirm it, and as often broke all his oaths and engagements. At last, the Barons took arms under the conduct of the Earl of Leicester, Son of the famous Simon Montfort General of the Crusade against the Albigenses. The King had the misfortune to lose a battle, and to see himself, his brother the King of the Romans, and his Son Prince Edward, in the hands of the Earl of Leicester, who obliged them to swear, they would never oppose the execution of Magna Charta. The Earl of Leicester governed some time in the name of the King his prisoner. It is pretended, the Commons were first received into Parliament during his administration. But without staying to examine so difficult a question, I shall only observe, that at least it cannot be denied, that since the end of Henry III's reign the Commons have ever enjoyed this privilege.

Prince Edward, son of Henry III, having happily made his escape from the Earl of Leicester, gained a battle in which the Earl was slain. This victory restored the King to his liberty, who used it not agreeably to the oath he had been obliged to take. But his reign and life ended a few years after his deliverance. Though the Barons party was very much humbled, yet Edward I, who in 1272 succeeded his Father Henry III, confirmed Magna Charta. However, some steps taken by him afterwards, discovered a design to revoke it; but the Barons beginning to stir, he retracted, and confirmed it once more.

Edward II, his son, and successor in 1307, was deposed by the Parliament, for intending to establish an absolute power contrary to Magna Charta.

Edward III, son and successor of this unfortunate Prince in 1327, confirmed it ten times during the course of his reign, which the victories obtained by himself and his son the Prince of Wales, over France, rendered extremely glorious.

Richard II, grandson and successor to Edward III. in 1377, was solemnly deposed, for having violated in many instances the privileges of the people, founded on Magna Charta.

Henry IV, who had used that pretence to dethrone Richard II. in 1399, and put himself in his place, made some attempts to diminish the privileges of the Parliament; but did not carry very far the execution of this project.

Henry V, his son, who succeeded him in 1413, maintained the Parliament in all its rights, and left the privileges of his Subjects untouched. His reign was one continued series of victories, and successes against France. He died in 1422.

From that time the government of England remained so well settled, and so firm upon its foundations, I mean, the prerogatives of the King, and the privileges of the Parliament, that for near two hundred years, not one King appears to have had any intention to shake it. The policy of the Kings, turned wholly upon governing their Parliaments by secret intrigues, without discovering any design of altering the constitution. True it is, that some Kings, as Henry VIII, did what they pleased, but without any prejudice to the privileges of Parliament. On the contrary, by supporting the Parliament in its rights, they had the address to make it subservient to their ends. This, by the way, is the best, and perhaps the only method for a King to render himself powerful and easy.

After so long a continuance of the same form of government, and so uninterrupted a possession of the privileges of Magna Charta, the English nation was so accustomed to it, that it seemed impossible to make any alteration without throwing the Kingdom into confusion. Nay, it seemed there was no fear that any King should ever think of attempting so difficult a thing, at the hazard of his Crown, as had been the case of some former Kings. Notwithstanding all this, James I, successor to Queen Elizabeth in 1603, failed not to take some steps in this dangerous course, and endeavour to diminish the privileges of Parliament. It was by the pernicious counsels of the Duke of Buckingham, his favorite, that he engaged in this design, which probably would have ended unfortunately for him, had not death surprized him before he had plainly discovered his intention.

This Duke of Buckingham ought to be considered as the first author of the troubles, which have so long infected England, and still do infect it to this Day.

It was under Charles I. son and successor of James in 1623, that the project to render the King absolute, and independent of the Laws, was vigorously pushed and advanced by all methods. The Duke of Buckingham, favorite to Charles I., as he had been to his father, inspired him with maxims directly contrary to the established Government, and thereby occasioned his ruin. The Duke being assassinated, the design was pursued by Charles, which had been begun by the deceased favorite. He imagined, the nation might be governed without a Parliament, or at least that Parliaments were only to supply him with money. He had dissolved three in the four first years of his reign, and even signified his intention of calling no more. Twelve years passed without a Parliament, during which the King levied taxes by the bare act of his will, upon his Subjects, and by his conduct discovered a reign arbitrarily. Unhappily for him, he admitted to his person and council two men imbued with the same maxims, by whom he was pushed on to his ruin; namely, William Laud Archbishop of Canterbury, and Thomas Wentworth Earl of Strafford.

While this Prince had no difficulties to struggle with from abroad, he enjoyed his usurped power with some tranquillity, but not without the open murmurings of the people. Mean time, no person dared to oppose so violent a torrent. At last, the Archbishop of Canterbury advising him to finish the reformation of the Scotch Hierarchy, and introduction of the English Liturgy, he followed the pernicious advice, but could not execute his project, without engaging in an open war in 1639, with his ancient Kingdom of Scotland. He levied forces, and maintained them by taxes, which he himself had imposed. Money failing him after the first campaign, he at last, in April 1640, called a Parliament, which was dissolved in a few days, for the same reason as the three first, and the arbitrary impositions continued as before. But the King quickly perceived, that the continuation of his power, depended upon the happy success of his arms. The people served him with regret. The Lords on divers pretences withdrew from Court. The validity of his orders, by virtue whereof his impositions were levied, were contested in town and country. In short, the King saw his Subjects every where ready to desert him, on the first occasion.

This occasion presented it self sooner than he expected. His army having received a check, and the Scots surprized Newcastle, the King was forced to seek means to drive them out of England, whereas he had hoped to become absolute in Scotland. But instead of finding his English Subjects ready to assist him, he saw them on the contrary rejoice at his disgrace, and considered it as a proper opportunity to recover their privileges. In this extremity, he assembled the Peers at York, in order to advise with them upon what was to be done. Their unanimous opinion, was, that the only way to free himself from the present difficulties, was to call a Parliament. He then perceived, that an interval of fifteen years was not capable to efface out of the minds of the English, the memory of their Parliaments, which they looked upon as the strongest support of their Liberties. Mean while, he was under a sort of necessity to follow the advice of the Peers, in calling a Parliament (1).

In the present disposition of the people to the King, such Representatives were chosen, as were eminent for their ability, courage, and firm attachment to the privileges of the Subject. The Parliament being met, instead of thinking to drive the Scots out of the Kingdom, as the King had hoped, believed they ought, before all things, to secure the Liberties of the nation, by setting bounds to the illegal authority, which the King had for fifteen years assumed. This resolution was no sooner discovered, than all the people adhered to the Parliament. From that time the King was so destitute of friends, that he saw himself unable to resist the torrent. His only refuge was, to comply with his Parliament, and pass almost every Bill presented to him to curb his authority. He hoped, by this condescension, to convince his Subjects of his intention to return to the ancient course from which he had been diverted by evil counsels, and perhaps he really designed it, but could gain no belief. On the contrary, it was thought, that mere necessity obliged him to measures so opposite to the former. So, mutual confidence, so necessary between the King and his people, being entirely lost, the Parliament would no longer depend upon the sincerity of a Prince, whom they believed they had just cause to distrust. They therefore incessantly laboured to secure the Liberties of the Subject from any future invasion. To this end, they were not satisfied with obtaining the King's consent to Acts which reduced the Royal Power within its ancient limits, but also extorted his assent to laws, which considerably lessened the just prerogatives of the Crown. The friends of the Parliament scrupled not to affirm, that the Subject could never be secure in his property, while the King had power to return to his former courses. Thus King Charles, who had hoped to carry the royal authority higher than any of his predecessors, saw himself, on the contrary, deprived of great part of his legal power. He even had the mortification to see himself forced, in May 1641, to sign the Earl of Strafford's sentence, who had acted nothing without his orders, or at least his approbation. The Archbishop of Canterbury also, lost his head on the scaffold in 1644.

Had the Parliament contented themselves with settling the Government upon its ancient foundations, very probably, it would not afterwards have been easily shaken. But on such occasions it is difficult to keep a just medium. The leading members willing to screen themselves from the attempts of the royal power, almost entirely changed the ancient Constitution, by stripping the Crown of the best part of its prerogatives. It was no longer the King and Parliament which governed the nation, but the Parliament alone, or rather the House of Commons, managed all affairs. The House of Peers had scarce any other power, than that of an implicit assent to the Bills offered to them, and the King was but the shadow of a Sovereign. However, it was this very thing that procured him adherents, whom doubtless, he would never have had, if the balance had been kept even. Many thought it as strange that the Parliament should, as I may say, govern without a King, as that the King should attempt to rule without a Parliament. The constitution of the Government suffered equally by both usurpations. But that which brought the strongest accession to the King's party, was, that the Parliament, to gain the Scots to their interest, were possessed with the project, of changing the Episcopal Government of the Church, into Presbyterian, which they accomplished with open force. Most of the English, accustomed to see the Church under the direction of Bishops, could not bear this change without murmuring. But as these were not the strongest, because the Parliament had the treasure, army, and places at their disposal, their only refuge was to unite with the King.

Then it was that two Parties appeared in the Kingdom, one for the King, and one for the Parliament, with a sort of equality, which quickly made it thought, they would not long remain quiet, and without coming to arms. The King's adherents at first had the name of Cavaliers, which was afterwards changed into that of Tories: And those of the Parliament, then called Roundheads, have received the name of Whigs. The origin of these two famous distinctions is thus: At that time a sort of Irish Banditti, or robbers, who kept in the mountains and hills formed by the vast bogs of that country, were called Tories, and at present are known by the name of Rapparees. As the King's enemies accused him of favouring the Irish Rebellion, which broke out about that time, they gave his adherents the name of Tories. These, on the other hand, to be even with their enemies, who were closely united with the Scots, called them Whigs, a name of reproach used in Scotland (2). Hence it appears, that these two names are as ancient as the troubles, though they were not in vogue till many years after. I cannot precisely fix the time, but am of opinion, that Cavalier and Roundhead, continued till the Restoration of Charles II, and then by degrees, were changed into Tory and Whig. These are the two parties which began to divide England in the time of Charles I, and which still divide it to this day. The Roman Catholics, called Papists in England, joined, from the first, the King's party, which was more favorable to them than that of the Parliament, and have always remained united with the Tories.

What has been said, sufficiently shows, that the King's party was composed of two sorts of men, of which the one had principally in view the political interest of the King and the Crown, and the others, that of the Church of England. But they were all re-united in this point, that they found their mutual advantage in the King's prosperity, without which, they could not hope to succeed in their respective designs. For this reason, they were considered but as one party, under the same name of Cavaliers or Royalists. This mixture of two different views in the same party, subsists to this day, and is not one of the least causes of that confusion of ideas, which the word Tory occasions. To remove this ambiguity as much as is possible, I shall call the first, the Political or State Cavaliers, and the others, the Ecclesiastical or Church Cavaliers. Each of these two branches were again subdivided. For among the Political Cavaliers there were some, who following the maxims of the Duke of Buckingham, Archbishop Laud, and the Earl of Strafford, wished to see the King invested with absolute power, and able to destroy the privileges of the Parliament. These may be called the rank Cavaliers. Their number was small, and little capable to support the King in his adversity, though, during his prosperity, they made a great noise. The other branch of the Political Cavaliers, was composed of men whom I shall call moderate. These desired indeed the restoration of the Royal Authority, but according to the ancient Constitution. The other Cavaliers, whom I call Ecclesiastical, were also subdivided into two branches, one of which was composed of rigid Churchmen, who were against the least change in the discipline of the Church of England. Those who composed the other branch, were less scrupulous and obstinate, and may be called the Low or Moderate Churchmen.

In opposition to the Cavaliers or Royalists, the Roundheads, or Parliamentarians were divided into two principal branches, namely, the Political and Ecclesiastical. The first had principally in view, the maintenance of the Rights of the people, and the second, the advancement of Presbytery. Each of these branches was likewise subdivided into two, one whereof was composed of Republicans, who aimed at undermining the regal power, and erecting a Commonwealth; the other, of the Moderate Roundheads, or Parliamentarians, desired only to reduce the King to an incapacity of abusing his power, by leaving him the possession of his just rights. This relates only to the Political Roundheads, or Parliamentarians. As for the Ecclesi-

 (2) As a military term, they were first called from certain Robbers in Scotland. But Bunce tells us the name is derived from the word Whiggon used by the Western Scots in the 16th Century, from whence those divines were called Whiggons, and by contraction Whigs, p. 43.

affical, they also formed two branches, of which the first was composed of the rigid Presbyterians, who would be contented with nothing less than the destruction of the Hierarchy; and the other, of the moderate Presbyterians, who would have been satisfied with much less, and perhaps, with a bare toleration. It was absolutely necessary to premise thus much, in order to enable the Reader to understand the sequel of this Dissertation. I shall more largely speak of the views and interests of the different branches of the two parties, after I have finished the abridgment which their life obliged me to interrupt.

Whilst the King was in a deplorable state, without money or friends, and reduced to bear every thing from the Parliament, who had him, as I may say, at their mercy, he beheld a ray of hope shine in the life of the two parties, I have been speaking of. He thought immediately, that to foment the division could not but be advantageous to him, wherein he succeeded. He thereby saw himself at last in a condition to hope to do himself justice, by his arms, for the injuries of which he thought he had reason to complain. In this expectation he raised an army, and engaged in an open war against the Parliament, who on their side had now taken all the necessary measures to resist him.

The particulars of this war are needless here, since the sad conclusion of it is still recent. It will suffice to say, that Charles I. was vanquished, and beheaded the 30th of January 1648. Thus the King himself, the Duke of Buckingham, the Earl of Strafford, Archbishop Laud, authors of the project to render the King absolute, came all to a tragical end. If to these we add, the examples of John, Henry III., Edward II., Richard II. and lastly, of James II. who had all the same design, and all miscarried in the execution, it will be easy to see how difficult and dangerous it is for a King of England, to attempt to subvert so well cemented a Government.

Oliver Cromwell, author of Charles I.'s death, remained master of the Government. He durst not however assume the title of King; and if he had the address to render himself absolute, it was under the specious pretence of maintaining the nation's Liberties. He is the single instance in England, of an usurper dying a natural death in his usurpation.

While the sovereign authority was in Cromwell's hands, the Cavaliers were extremely humbled. But they revived on the death of this formidable enemy. To give their adversaries no advantage against them, they put themselves under the conduct of those of their party, who were the most moderate, so that there seemed to be no more rank or rigid Tories. This policy was absolutely necessary, at a time, when the royal prerogative, and the rights of the Church were not to be insisted on, as there were neither King nor Bishops. At last, by a most surprizing revolution, assisted by the prudent conduct of General Monk, the English united to set Charles II. on the throne, son of the deceased King, and to restore the Monarchy and the Church to their former state.

Charles II. reigned peaceably at first. He was a Prince who wanted neither wit nor penetration, but was indolent, and addicted to his pleasures. His intention was to live quietly, and avoid all disputes with his subjects. He was too weary of a long exile, during which he had often wanted common necessities, to be willing to hazard the being again reduced to the same state. On the other hand, the English had had time, and frequent occasion, to open their eyes, and discover, that by a pretended maintenance of their liberties, they had been drawn into servitude. For it may be affirmed, that England had never enjoyed less freedom, than under the Government of the long Parliament, and afterwards of Oliver Cromwell. However, Charles II. engaged himself by degrees, farther than he ever intended. This, doubtless, was owing either to his indolence, or too great condescension to his Ministers, who were all Cavaliers, whom, for the future, I shall call Tories, as I shall give the Roundheads the name of Whigs, though I do not know exactly when these two names were first used. The Tories therefore, who alone were in the King's confidence, were incessantly urging him to restore the Monarchy and Church to their ancient lustre. The Court of France, for interests of their own, laboured to inspire him with the same design. In a word, his Ministers took great care to hinder the Whigs from insinuating themselves into the King's favour.

The Tory party had at their head the Duke of York, the King's brother, a Prince naturally impetuous and violent, who having embraced the Roman Catholic Religion in his exile, formed the project of establishing it in England. This project could not be executed, without first extending the royal power beyond the bounds prescribed by the law, that is to say, without refusing and pursuing the same design, wherein his father had unhappily miscarried. But the Duke, by reason of his impetuous temper, was very improper to conduct such an undertaking. He pursued it eagerly during his brother's reign, who had no legitimate issue, hoping that the work then begun, would be more easy to finish on his own accession to the throne.

To succeed in this design, he had no other way than to begin it with the utter ruin of the Whigs, whose principles were directly contrary to the Duke's designs, both with regard to the Church and the State. It must be observed, that most of the Whigs were then Presbyterians. So, in pretending only to attack Presbyterianism, the Duke of York projected the destruction of those who opposed the increase of the royal power, without alarming the nation. Indeed, after humbling the Whigs, he might fear to meet with great obstacles from the moderate Tories, whose principles did not entirely agree with the arbitrary power he intended to establish. But he despised not to surmount, if the Whigs, his more dangerous enemies, were once removed out of the way. To this end, he induced his brother to persecute the Presbyterians, wherein he was assisted by all the Tories, who with pleasure beheld this first occasion of being revenged on their enemies, the Whigs. So Presbyterianism was furiously attacked, under a pretence of restoring the Church to the state it was in before the troubles. An Act was passed, forbidding the Presbyterian assemblies, which were called Covenanters; and another known by the name of the Ten-Articles, which indeed more directly concerned the Roman Catholics. This Act ordained, that no person should be admitted to any publick office, without producing a certificate of his having communicated in an episcopal Church. Moreover, it was called the Conformity Act, because all who were to be admitted to any office, were obliged by this Statute to conform to the Church of England.

The Whigs soon perceived, that under colour of maintaining the rights of the Church of England, the Duke of York's design was to change the Government of the State, and ruin the Protestant Religion in England. It required some time to take just measures; and at last, with the assistance of the moderate Tories, who feared the Duke of York's going too far, they obliged the King to send him out of the Kingdom. Nay, the Commons prepared a Bill, called the Exclusion Bill, to deprive him of the right of succession. But the passing of this Bill was prevented by the dissolution of the Parliament. Another was called at Oxford, in expectation of finding the members less violent. But the King was mistaken, and, after a short session, was again obliged to dissolve them, upon their endeavouring to pass the like Bill.

It will perhaps seem strange, that the scene should be thus changed, and the Whigs, who were extremely low, should suddenly become superior. To let the reader into the reason of this change, it is necessary to remark, that the moderate Tories promoted the designs of the Court, while they believed them levelled only against the Presbyterians. But perceiving, by all the proceedings of the King, the Duke of York, and the Ministers, that a project was formed to ruin the Constitution of Church and State, and undermine the foundations of Magna Charta, they readily joined with the Whigs to oppose the execution of this project. It was therefore this union which gave the Whigs a superiority, to which, otherwise, they could never have pretended. On the other hand, the State-Tories and rigid Churchmen, desiring to recover the ground they had lost, endeavoured to gain the people to their interest, by accusing the Whigs of a settled design to ruin the Church, and these in their turn accused the others, of intending the subversion of the Government, and of favouring the Duke of York's pernicious designs. Thus the enmity of the parties, which seemed to have been much weakened by the restoration, was revived. It may truly be said, that the Tories were in fault, who to revenge the wrongs received from the long Parliament, and Cromwell's usurpation, rashly threw themselves into the Duke of York's party. They afterwards repented, when they saw to what the Duke intended to make them subservient.

Some time after, the minds of the people being a little calmed, the Duke of York returned into England, and continued without interruption to foment division, without which he could not hope to effect his designs. So this Prince, (by an excess of zeal for his Religion, by a desire of revenge, and perhaps excited by the ambition of accomplishing a project, which had been in vain attempted by several Kings of England) and Charles II. through a too great condescension to his brother, kindled a flame in England, which is not yet extinguished.

Charles II. died during these transactions, and the Duke of York ascended the throne, by the name of James II. without any opposition. He at first made great promises to his subjects, that neither Religion, nor the Constitution, should suffer any change in his reign. But he was far from performing his promises. Shortly after, the Duke of Monmouth, natural son of Charles II. relying on the discontent of the people, left the Low-Countries, where he had lived some time in exile, made a descent in England with a handful of men, and assumed the title of King. But his royalty lasted but few days. His party being much weaker than he had expected, he was defeated, taken, and beheaded. The King was so elated by a victory, obtained with such ease, that he scrupled not to discover his designs, so secure did he think himself of the success. The Judges, who were devoted to him, gave their opinion, that the King might dispense with the laws. Their decision was founded upon some Statutes lodging this power in the Sovereign, with regard to certain laws; and upon examples of some of his predecessors, who had, in this respect, exceeded the bounds of their power. Thus these corrupted Judges drew from particular cases a general conclusion, and founded a permanent right upon some transient usurpations.

This door being opened, the King, by his sole authority repealed the penal laws, enacted by several Parliaments to prevent the designs of the Papists. He next filled his army with officers of that Religion, and bestowed preferments and titles upon men, who by the laws were unqualified. He took away the Charters from London, and other Corporations, and reduced them to a dependence upon his pleasure. In short, by a bare proclamation he granted a full liberty of conscience, and permitted to each sect the publick profession of their Religion. This Proclamation had a double view, to favour the Papists, and to amule the Presbyterians. The King was persuaded, that as the latter were still liable to the penal laws enacted against them in the late reign, they would be glad to be freed from them, and that the fear of forfeiting the liberty granted by the Proclamation would keep them in submissiveness. But they were not deceived by an artifice directly tending to their ruin. I omit many other steps taken by the King, which were but too capable to fill all his Subjects with terror.

Hitherto the Tories in general had favoured the King's designs. But when they perceived, all his proceedings tended to a subversion of the established government, and ruin of the Protestant Religion, they began to repent of their past conduct. They clearly saw, that by the course they were made to take, it was intended to lead them where they designed not to go, and that they could not attain their end, the ruin of the Whigs, without the loss of their Religion and liberty. In this danger, which could not be more imminent, they joined the Whigs, and with them, resolved to call in the Prince of Orange to free them from their dangerous state. From that time the King's party became extremely weak, being composed of only Papists, rank Tories, and some Lords, slaves of the Court, and their fortune. Mean while, the King appeared outwardly as powerful as ever, and near the end of his undertaking; because those who yet seemed attached to the Court, did not think proper to declare before the time. The Prince of Orange was landed before the King's weakness was visible. His army, his fleet, the Lords whom he thought most devoted to his person, forsook him at once, and he was reduced to the sad necessity of trying, in a disguise to escape out of his Kingdom. But failing even in this attempt, he had the mortification to see himself at the mercy of the Prince of Orange, and, in all appearance, indebted to his generosity, or perhaps his policy, for the indirect means which were furnished him, of flying into France. This example shows, that though the English are divided into two parties, and there is great enmity between them, their passion does not however cause them, in general at least, to abandon the interests of Religion and Liberty.

William and Mary being crowned, on the flight, or, as it was called, the Abdication of King James, their chief care was to stifle the seeds of division still subsisting between the Whigs and Tories, though the danger had united them. In order to this, it was necessary to remove from the ministry and their confidence, the favourers of King James's designs, and the bigots to the minutest Rites and Ceremonies of the Church of England. Without this, the Whigs could never have enjoyed any quiet, since they ever considered the rank and rigid Tories, as their irreconcilable enemies. On the other hand, it was not less necessary to remove from the Council the most rigid Whig Presbyterians, for fear of giving occasion to think, there was a design to change the Church-government. This fear would have been the more just, as the new King having ever professed in Holland the Presbyterian Religion, the least step in its favour, might have raised a suspicion of his designing to establish it upon the ruins of the national Church. Great address was therefore to be used to remove all cause of fear and jealousy in the Tories. It was for these purposes, that during the reign of William and Mary, the offices were generally conferred on the moderate men of both parties. This maxim was pursued by King William when he reigned alone, after the Queen's death. But as it was impossible to please both parties at once, unless there had been more places to give, he affected frequently to change his ministry, and employ the two parties alternately. This was all he could do, till time should have extinguished entirely the flames of division.

Under such circumstances, and a King of such wisdom and foresight, it may be almost affirmed, that no Disturbance would have happened to the Government from the difference of the principles of the two parties, if the Church-Tories could have been contented with seeing their Church remain established. But they could not be satisfied, so long as they saw the Presbyterians enjoy an entire liberty of conscience, publicly exercise their religion, and fill offices, contrary to the Conformity-Act of Charles II. They were jealous that the Whigs intended by degrees to undermine the Church, and that the King concurred with them in that design. What they had seen during the long Parliament gave them occasion to fear the same attacks. The rank Tories, having lost King James, their patron and defender, inspired the Episcopal party with these fears and jealousies, to animate them against King William. They perceived, they were no longer able to support themselves, unless means were found to engage the Church in their quarrel. Hence the rumours indolently spread among the People, of the Church's being in danger. The Whigs saw by this, that the rank Tories had not relinquished their projects, but would, whenever they were armed with power, make use of the pretence of religion to ruin them, in imitation of King James. It was thus, that animosity was continued between the two parties, notwithstanding King William's care and endeavours.

It seemed therefore, that Religion was then the sole point in question between the two parties; the junctures not allowing either the rank Tories, or the republican Whigs, to push their principles. This has given occasion to a false idea of the differences between the two parties, and to an imagination, that they solely consist in a diversity of sentiments concerning Church-Government. But this is certainly a mistake. When an opportunity offers, the rank Tories show, that the safety of the Church is not the sole motive of their conduct, and probably the Republican-Whigs would also remember their maxims, at a favorable juncture.

As to the Papists, who may be considered as a branch of the Tories, they would have had reason to be satisfied with King William's moderation, if their extreme desire to see King James again on the throne, had not caused them to look upon the reigning King as their enemy. Some of them were even engaged in conspiracies against his person, which only turned to their own confusion and ruin. This immoderate desire expressed by the Papists, and even by some Tories, for the restoration of King James, obliged King William to seek means, not only for the prevention of their ill designs during his life, but also to render their endeavours fruitless after his death. Accordingly, by an Act of Parliament the succession of the Crown was settled in the illustrious House of Hanover, without any regard to the pretensions which birth or nearness of blood could give to any Papist whatsoever. William died shortly after, and Anne, daughter of James II, and Princess of Denmark, mounted the throne.

This Queen had been educated in the principles of the rigid Tories with respect to Religion, and, probably in those of the rank Tories, with regard to Government. At least, all who had any power over her, or were concerned in her education, were of this character. Charles II. her uncle, James II. her father, the Earl of Rochester her mother's brother, were all rank Tories, deeming any opposition to the Sovereign's will, a manifest rebellion. Queen Anne was besides of no great capacity, and naturally obstinate. An accidental quarrel with her sister Queen Mary, having made her resolve to withdraw from Court, she was so punctual to her resolution, that she would not even visit the Queen her sister, when on her death-bed. The meanness of her genius foretold the power which her Ministry would have in the Government. On the other hand, her education made it feared, she would be guided by the rank and rigid Tories, of whom her uncle the Earl of Rochester, was considered as the head. This Lord was equally dreaded by the Whigs and moderate Tories, as a dangerous man, and capable of carrying things to extremities. He was otherwise a person of great parts, but very fond of his principles. Probably, he was going to be at the helm of the Government, by the accession of the Queen his niece to the throne. But it is pretended, that the fear of the moderate Tories to see him in so high a post, made them resolve to join with the Whigs, to prevent it. At least it is certain, that such an union was made, which forced the Queen to throw herself into their arms, and trust them with the management of affairs. I am a stranger to the intrigues used to bring the Queen to these measures. The Lords Godolphin, Marlborough, and some other leaders of the moderate Tories, were among those who joined the Whigs, and strengthened them more by their ability, than their credit and numbers. From this time, the moderate Tories and the Whigs made but one party.

It is needless to relate here, with what glory to England, and to the Queen in particular, these new Ministers directed the publick affairs. This is a thing universally known, and the memory of it still recent. But it is pretended, that by reason of the meanness of the Queen's genius, they held her in a kind of servitude, though they outwardly affected to give her the honour of all her glorious successes. During their administration, the rank and rigid Church-Tories were excluded from all civil employments, and ecclesiastical dignities. Had this continued to the death of the Queen, these two branches of the Tory party would doubtless have been considerably lessened in number and credit.

Mean time, the Queen saw herself, not without some impatience, forced, as it were, to follow the counsels of those whom she had a right to command, and who, if publick report is to be credited, left her not free to pursue her own inclinations or judgment. The rank Tories perceiving, or perhaps suggesting these sentiments to the Queen, indolently cherished her discontent, by the assistance of a certain Lady, who was in her confidence. Such was their success, that after they had satisfied her, that she was a slave, they brought her to a resolution of freeing herself. This intrigue was conducted with such art and secrecy, that her Ministers found themselves supplanted, before any measures could be taken to prevent their ruin. Immediately, their places were filled with rank and furious Tories. The Parliament, in which the Whigs had a great superiority of votes, was dissolved, and another called, to which the new Ministers took care to have members returned devoted to their party. Any person, ever so little acquainted with the affairs of England, knows what influence the Court has in the elections. It may, however, be affirmed, that in respect of number, the party of the Ministry was still inconsiderable. But they had the Queen and the Parliament on their side. Besides, they were very careful to strengthen their party, by insufling jealousies on the account of Religion, and perfwading the Episcopalians that the Church had been in great danger, during the late administration, and would always be so, as long as the Whigs had any share in the Government. These insinuations revived the passion of the Church-Tories, and carried them to such excesses against the Presbyterians, as should not be allowed in a well ordered state, but which these Ministers affected to connive at. Indeed, their design was not to lessen, but rather to increase the animosity between the two parties, because their own was thereby strengthened.

Hitherto every thing succeeded to the wish of the new Ministry. But they were very sensible, that the present advantages procured by these imaginary terrors would be of no long continuance. Besides, though they could have kept the People always in this disposition, the Queen might die very soon, especially as she was very infirm. In that case, they had reason to fear, the fabrick they had raised, would be demolished, by the Elector of Hanover, who was to succeed the Queen, by virtue of the act of Succession, for which he was chiefly indebted to the Whigs. They were therefore to think of preventing this danger without loss of time. Their party was too weak to struggle with the Sovereign, should he happen to be against them, as had been often seen during the reign of King William, and in the first years of Queen Anne. They therefore concluded, at least, if we may judge by their proceedings, that their surest way would be to secure the Crown to the Pretender, in order to have a protector when the Queen should fail them. It is however still uncertain, whether the Earl of Oxford, that able minister, now in the Tower, was of this opinion. But it cannot be denied, that they believed the assistance of France to be absolutely necessary for their support. Accordingly, to secure it, they made a dishonorable and hasty peace, to the astonishment of all Europe, and forced the allies of England to follow her example. Probably, had not the Queen died so soon after the peace, the oppressed Whigs would have been obliged to call in to their assistance, the Elector of Hanover, as they had before the Prince of Orange, but with far less hope of having the general concurrence of the people. The reason is, because King James's design to subvert the Church and State, was so open, that it could not be doubted, whereas against the Pretender there were only bare presumptions.

What has lately happened since King George's accession to the throne, shows, there was a formed design to secure the succession to the Pretender, had not the death of the Queen happened, before the authors of it had time to take all their measures. It is however uncertain, whether they could have executed their design, or whether, if they could, the Pretender's reign would have been of any long continuance. The English in general are extremely jealous of their Laws and Liberties, nor are they less so of their Religion. This is what I think I may venture to affirm, though some of them seem indifferent as to the latter. But, thanks be to God, these are far from being the majority. Now it would have been very difficult for the Pretender, advanced to the Throne by foreign aid, professing a religion contrary to the national, and guided by rank Tories, to keep himself within the bounds of Moderation, necessary to gain the hearts of his subjects, without which a King of England can never sit firmly on his Throne. However, without staying to guess what might have happened, let us only observe that the rank and rigid Tories have been disappointed. Not only, the Pretender is not King, but his hopes of becoming so were never less. King George is in peaceable possession of his Crown; the Tories are humbled, and the Whigs, lately oppressed, are now at the top of the Wheel.

After this brief account of the rise and progress of the Tories and Whigs, it will not perhaps be unacceptable to the Reader to know more particularly the views, interests, strength, and characters of the two Parties. For this purpose the different branches before-mentioned must be carefully distinguished. It is therefore necessary to repeat here that the two parties may be considered under two different relations; namely, with respect to the State, and with regard to the Church. I shall first speak of the State-Tories and Whigs, after which, I shall consider them with respect to religion.

The State-Tories are, as I said, divided into two branches, one of which may in French be called, Rank. In England they are known by the name of High-Flyers. This Idea, taken from Birds that by soaring above the common flight, lose themselves in the clouds, is very suitable to men, who cannot contain themselves within the limits of the established Government. These are for having the sovereign absolute in England, as he is in France and some other Countries, and for erecting his will into law. They regard not what I have said in the beginning of this Dissertation, that all the governments at this day in Europe were originally like that established in England; and consequently there is no reason why the English should imitate nations who have suffered it to be lost, or at least very much altered. It may be imagined that in such a Country as England, this party cannot be very numerous, and yet they are very considerable for three reasons. First, because the heads of this party are persons of the highest rank, and commonly favorites and ministers of State, or such as hold the greatest offices at Court, and the most eminent dignities in the Church. These men, who would not willingly put themselves under the conduct of others, being thus advantageously situated, become, generally, the leaders of all the Tory-Party. They manage them as they please, not only for the advantage of the whole party, but chiefly for their own particular ends. Thus very often, under pretence of acting for the interest of the party, their proceedings tend only to their own advantage, and the Tories are led by them much farther than most of them desire. It is this which gives occasion to many persons to accuse all the Tories of being for arbitrary power, though it is certain that only the High-Flyers are chargeable with this principle. But 'tis no great fault, it seems, to ascribe to a whole party what is done by their leaders.

Secondly, This particular branch of Tories is considerable, in that, when they are in the ministry, they engage the Church-Tories strenuously to maintain the Doctrine of Passive-Obedience, which goes a great way towards gaining the people to their party. They insinuate to the Episcopal Ministers, that they have only in view the ruin of the Presbyterians, and under that pretence cause them to preach a Doctrine, the consequence of which extends to all the subjects. This was experienced in the reigns of Charles II, of James II, and of Queen Anne, towards the conclusion.

Lastly, The party of the High-Flyers becomes very powerful, when, as it frequently happens, they are supported by the King, and then it is that the liberty of the nation is in danger. Proof of this, have been seen in the reigns of James II, and Charles I, Richard II,

Edward II, and Henry III; for the High-Flyers are more antient than is imagined.

The second branch of the State-Tories is composed of those I called moderate. These are for having the King enjoy all his Prerogatives, but they pretend not, with the High-Flyers, to sacrifice to him the privileges of the subject. They are true Englishmen, who have the welfare of their country at heart, and are for preserving the constitution transmitted to them by their ancestors. They have often saved the State, and will again save it, when in danger from the rank Tories or Republican-Whigs, by opposing with all their power those who shall attempt to alter the Government. It would be injustice, to confound them with the High-Flyers under the general denomination of Tories.

As there are two branches of State-Tories, so there are two of State-Whigs, namely, Republican, and moderate Whigs. The Republican Whigs are the remains of the party of the long Parliament which endeavoured to turn the Government into a Commonwealth. These at present are so inconsiderable, that they serve only to strengthen the other Whigs with whom they usually join. The Tories would persuade the publick, that all Whigs are of this kind. And in like manner the Whigs would have it believed that all Tories are High-Flyers. But this is only an artifice to render one another mutually odious.

The second branch of the State-Whigs contains the moderate Whigs, who are nearly allied to the moderate Tories in principle; and consequently are to be considered as true Englishmen, who desire, the Government may be maintained upon its antient foundations. Herein they would be exactly like the moderate Tories, were it not that these incline more to the King, and the moderate Whigs to the Parliament. The moderate Whig is perpetually hindering the People's rights from being invaded, and sometimes even takes precautions at the expence of the Crown. By him the Triennial Act was procured, with some others, which 'tis needless to mention, to prevent the abuse of the royal power. Hence it is evident that the High-Flyers have no greater enemy than the moderate Whig, and that these two branches of Whigs and Tories properly form the opposition between the State-Tories and State-Whigs. These last laugh at Passive-Obedience when its consequences are carried too far. Their Principle is, that the royal power has its bounds, which cannot be transgressed, without injustice. Consequently they believe, that whenever the Sovereign exceeds his prerogatives, he may be resisted by his subjects. Hence it is easy to infer, they do not think the King can dispense with the laws.

What has been said is sufficient to show that the moderate State-Whigs and Tories are almost of the same sentiments. Their being of different parties proceeds from their mutual fear that either may make the balance incline too much to the King's or the Parliament's side. It is not therefore strange, that these two Branches of the opposite parties, unite in the pressing exigencies of the State. For, their views equally point to the preservation of the Government; though often they pursue their end by different paths. Accordingly since the union of these two branches upon the death of King William, they have remained inseparable, and the moderate Whig and Tory form almost the same party, under the common appellation of Whig. I dare not however affirm that there are not yet moderate Tories who keep by themselves, and are unwilling to be confounded with the Whigs.

It must be remembered that hitherto I have only spoke of the Tories and Whigs in relation to the Government, without any regard to religion. I take care not to confound things which ought to be carefully distinguished. It is not true that all church-men are Tories, or all Presbyterians, Whigs in point of Government, as is commonly imagined. Many Presbyterians are in this respect of the same principles with the moderate Tories, and would not be less concerned to see the King stripped of his Prerogatives, than the subject of his privileges. In like manner, many Church-men, even Bishops themselves, are Whigs, very good Whigs as to the Government, and as considered in opposition to the High-Flyers, which shows the necessity of distinguishing State-Tories and Whigs, from Church-Whigs and Tories, of whom we are now going to speak.

I presume the reader knows that the Church of England, when she received the reformation, admitted only some alterations in her Doctrine, but preserved the Hierarchy with all the ceremonies in which she saw nothing superstitious. The reformation was not properly completed till the reign of Elizabeth. Then it was that several constitutions of the Convocation, confirm'd by Acts of Parliament, settled the publick worship as it stands to this day. Mean while, many Englishmen who had fled from the rage of Queen Mary, return'd home with favourable sentiments of the reformation, as established in France, Switzerland, Geneva, and other parts of Germany. These men could not comply with the reformation in England, which, in their opinion, had not been carried far enough from the Church of Rome. For this reason they not only absented themselves from the assemblies, of the established Church, but also composed separate assemblies which were called Conventicles. These Separatists were likewise filed Presbyterians, because, refusing their submission to the Bishops, they maintained that all Priests or Ministers had an equal authority in the Church, which ought to be governed by Presbyteries, or Consistories, composed of Ministers and Lay-Elders. Upon this occasion were two parties formed, who wanting the mutual forbearance of persons professing in the main the same religion, began to molest one another with disputes in conference and writing. The Church of England men were very angry, that private persons should pretend to reform what, after mature deliberation, had been established by national Synods and Parliaments. On the other hand, the Presbyterians thought it no less strange, that they should be compelled to practise what they believed contrary to the purity of Religion (1), and with what their consciences could not comply. The Presbyterians were long oppressed, because their adversaries supported their arguments with reasons from the authority of the Queen and Parliament.

The Presbyterians conceived great hopes of the accession of James I, because that Prince had always professed their religion whilst he reigned in Scotland. But as he readily conformed to the Church of England, they were not much eased. Mean while, this party, though oppressed, so increased, that in the beginning of the troubles they were become very numerous. King Charles I, was so attached to the Church of England, that it may be affirmed, he died a Martyr to it, as is evident from his History. His opinion of the purity of this Church, made him hearken to William Laud Archbishop of Canterbury, suggesting to him the reduction of the Church of Scotland under the same Government with that of England, by introducing the Hierarchy. This undertaking engaged him in a war with Scotland, and the war produced the long Parliament, against which he thought himself obliged to take arms. This Parliament wanting the assistance of the Scots, could not obtain it but by an engagement to make the Church of England Presbyterian. A quarrel was therefore fought with the Bishops, Deans and Chapters, in a word, with the whole Church of England, which saw its Hierarchy, established by Queen Elizabeth, entirely subverted, and the Scotch Presbyterian Government introduced. In this distress the Episcopalians had no other resource than to unite the Episcopal party with the King's party, and as they had one common interest with the Cavaliers, namely, the maintenance of the King's cause, they were confounded with them under the same party Denomination. The Presbyterians were in the like manner reckoned among the Roundheads, because they adhered to the Parliament.

During the long Parliament, and even to the death of Cromwell, the division of the branches just mentioned, was hardly perceived. All who were known by the name of Roundheads, or Parliamentarians, were rigid Presbyterians and Republicans. This was the party then in vogue, and the only one that could prefer such as aspired to the posts in the gift of the Parliament. In like manner the followers of the King's party appeared to be rank Cavaliers, or rigid Episcopalians, because these were then most regarded at Court. But on the Restoration of Charles II, the several branches of the two parties began to be distinguished. All being tired with the troubles which had so long harassed the Kingdom, the moderate no longer feared to discover their sentiments. Some of the Presbyterians testified a readiness to relax, and many Episcopalians were of opinion that, for the sake of peace, some concession might be used to the Presbyterians. These therefore were the men of both parties, who preferring this moderation, formed the two branches of the moderate Whigs and Tories, with respect to religion. But still the majority in both parties; firmly adhered to their principles with inconceivable obstinacy. Amongst the Episcopalians there were, who, upon no account whatsoever, could be persuaded to recede in the least from the practice of their Church. On the other hand, there were Presbyterians, who were no less offended at seeing a minister officiate in a Surplice, than at hearing him preach Heresy, and who branded with the name of Idolatrous and Superstitious, every ceremony retained by the Church of England. This gave birth to the two branches of the rigid Episcopalians and Presbyterians, which subsist to this day. The Hierarchy is the principal point, on which they are divided. They are both comprised under the name of Whigs and Tories, because the rigid Episcopalians join with the Tories, and the Presbyterians with the Whigs.

From what has been said concerning the several branches of Whig and Tory, it is easy to gather that these two names are very obscure and equivocal terms, because they convey, or ought to convey to the mind different ideas, according to the subject discoursed of. For instance, if I hear it said, that the Tories and Whigs are at great enmity, this raises in my mind an idea comprehending all the several branches of Whigs and Tories in general. But if I am told, the Tories are for having the King absolute and independent, or that the Whigs would be glad the regal power were abolished, my idea can only extend to the High-Flyers and the Republican Whigs. The rest of the Whigs and Tories would doubtless be offended at any such imputations. In like manner, if I hear that the Tories had rather see a Papist on the Throne than a Protestant, favourable to the Whigs, I should injure the Tories in general, by imputing such a thought to them, which can only be entertained by the Popish and some rigid Church-Tories, and perhaps some High-Flyers. Lastly, if I hear that the Whigs aim at the ruin of the Church of England, I can understand this only of the Presbyterian-Whigs, since the Episcopal Whigs, amongst whom are several Bishops, cannot with justice be accused of labouring the ruin of their own Church. Thus the names of Tories and Whigs convey to the mind certain confused ideas, which few are capable of rightly distinguishing. But this difficulty still increases, when it is considered that the same person may be either Whig or Tory, according to the subject in hand. A Presbyterian, for instance, who wishes the ruin of the Church of England, is certainly for that reason in the Whig-party. But if this Presbyterian opposes with all his power the attempts, or some of his party, against the regal authority, it cannot be denied that he is in that respect a true Tory. In like manner, when the Church only is concerned, the Episcopal-party are to be considered as Tories. But how many even of these are Whigs with respect to the Government? Nor have Foreigners only such confused ideas in this matter; the English themselves are liable to them. Nothing is more frequent than to hear a Whig charging all the Tories in general with an intention to destroy the rights and liberties of the subject; and a Tory arraigning the Whigs without distinction, as utter enemies to the Church and State. Every man uses this confusion of ideas, occasioned by the names of Whig and Tory, to accuse his adversaries of what is most odious in both parties.

Having shown as distinctly as I could, what is to be understood by the Tories and Whigs, I am next to examine the several motives and interests of the two parties. Were we to rely on what is said by both, nothing is more just, more equitable, than the motives by which they are actuated, namely, the glory of God, the honour of the King, the public good, and the welfare of the nation. For my part, if I may speak my mind, it is my belief, that as they are all men, interest is the main spring of all their actions. Since the two parties were formed, each has carefully laboured to gain a superiority over the other, because this superiority is attended with posts, honours and dignities, which are conferred on their own members by the prevailing, in exclusion of those of the contrary party. This made King William say that, If he had placed enough in the balance, he would have reconciled the two parties. There would be yet another expedient to supply what that Prince imagined, namely, to confer all the great places upon neutral Lords. But where shall we find a sufficient number of such, who are qualified to execute them? Certainly there are but very few. I own however, there are some, who, by their capacity, their impartiality, their disinterestedness, would deserve a particular distinction. I wish I knew them all, that I might infer their names, and give them in part their due praise. But these Lords, so worthy of being known, are little heard of in foreign parts, because as they make their court to neither party, the public posts generally fall not to their share. Nevertheless, it sometimes happens that Ministers are in a manner obliged to find out these neutral Lords, and advance them to the first dignities in the Kingdom. We know one especially, who without ever courted the Whig or Tory Ministers, was sent Ambassador and Plenipotentiary at the peace of Ryswick, honoured with the order of the Garter, successively raised to the offices of Lord Privy-Seal, Lord President of the Council, Lord High-Admiral of England, and Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, though he never solicited these great offices. I speak of the Earl of Pembroke, whose reputation is better known to me, than that of some other Lords of the same Character, who ought to receive no injury from my silence. Among all his other virtues, his integrity in the great posts which he has filled, calls for much nobler encomiums than he can receive from a Foreigner, who has neither the honour to know him personally, nor to be known by him. If there were in England twelve such Lords, advanced to the great offices, it would be an infallible means to humble both parties at once. Then the aspirers to employments would make it a merit to espouse neither party, and this impartiality would soon descend from the great men to the people. But this is a happiness rather to be desired than hoped. Neutrality, far from promoting persons of distinguished merit, is rather a sure impediment to their rising, because the ministers and party-leaders think only of gratifying their cretures.

Interest, as I said, is the principal motive which actuates the two parties, and this is but too apparent. If, for instance, the High-Flyers wish to see the Sovereign in possession of absolute power, I very much doubt whether this flows from a desire of promoting the welfare of the Kingdom, though they should be persuaded that despotism is the most complete form of Government. If the public good was the sole spring of their actions, they would not be so warm. The same may be said of the other branches of the two parties. Each would have it believed, they have only the good of the Kingdom in view, while in fact they are only labouring for themselves, their family and posterity. But when I say that interest is their principal motive, I pretend not to exclude entirely many others, which may actuate as well the heads as the members of each party. Some believe that their principles really tend to the good of the State; others act from a religious motive; some are swayed by revenge, party-spirit, and the desire of superiority. Numberless other motives there are on which I think it needless to enlarge, that I may not be led to examine the conduct of particulars. It is certain, many may pursue the same end from different motives. It will be better to show the strength and several interests of both parties. In order to this, it is necessary to proceed in this examination according to the different branches into which they are divided. I shall begin with the Tories.

It is difficult at first to conceive, that in a country like England, blessed with so many noble privileges which other nations do not at present enjoy, there should be men who wish to see the King invested with unlimited power. There are indeed but very few who openly profess themselves to be of the party which I call High-Flyers. Nevertheless it is but too true that such a party has always been in England and but submits to this day, though disowned by most of those who are engaged in it. Can it be denied that such a party existed under Charles I.? The very Judges of the Kingdom, who are considered as the interpreters of the law, gave it by their opinion, that in cases of necessity the King might impose taxes upon his subjects, and that the King himself is the sole judge of such cases. This was rooting up the noblest Privilege of the Parliament, and the principal cause of their frequent meetings. If the sovereign could levy taxes upon his subjects, without authority of Parliament, it may be affirmed, that their sessions would be very rare, and perhaps in time, entirely cease. But if the Parliament were once laid aside, what would become of the privileges and immunities of the subject? In all likelihood the case would be the same as in France, since the general assembly of the States has been discontinued. Has it not also been seen under James II. that the Judges, ascrib'd to the King a power of dispensing with the Penal Laws? And was not this making him absolute? In short, we have seen Charles I., Charles II., James II., taking large steps towards arbitrary Power, which they would never have attempted, had they not expected to be supported by a numerous party. Let Queen Anne's proceedings in the last years of her reign be considered; for instance, the negotiation and conclusion of the peace of Utrecht, the creation of twelve Peers at once, the violence used in Parliamentary-Elections, and it cannot be denied that they were so many advances towards despotism, to which she was excited by the party I am speaking of. It is therefore certain, there is such a party in the Kingdom. But as they dare not openly avow their principles, they cover them with the pretence of maintaining the rights of the Crown, to which they seem to confine themselves, willing to have it believed that they are of the party of the moderate Tories. But the principal High-Flyers, being commonly Favorites or Ministers of State, it generally happens that they become heads of the whole party of the Tories, and engage them to do more than they would. They begin with attacking the Presbyterians, and so engage the Church-Tories, to follow their measures, without knowing whether it is intended to lead them. On pretence of having the Dissenters only in view, they cause the Clergy to preach Passive-Obedience, which tends directly to Arbitrary-Power. It is this which renders the High-Flyers more powerful than appears at first sight. The main concern of this party lies in drawing the Church into their quarrel, by pretending an extreme zeal for her Rights. They are thereby confounded with the Church-Tories, whose number is very considerable, avoid giving the alarm to the moderate Tories, and keep themselves undiscovered till they have made the whole party subservient to their particular designs. But for all this, notwithstanding their care to observe what I have been saying, they have the misfortune never to arrive at the end of their career. After they have made themselves leaders of the whole Tory-party, and by secret paths, conducted the moderate and Church-Tories to a certain point, they are at last forced upon some Proceedings which discover their designs. Then they lose many of their followers, who not only desert them, but go over to the Whigs. This was the case of James II., who saw himself suddenly abandoned by all the world, just as he thought himself secure of his ends. If in the last year of Queen Anne the High-Flyers who governed in her name, had attempted to procure a Repeal of the Act of Succession, very probably, they would have met with the same mortification, and I do not doubt but the same thing will happen upon every the like occasion. The reason of what I advance seems to me evident, namely, that it can be advantageous but to very few Englishmen, to have a Popish or absolute King.

The party or branch of the moderate Tories much exceeds in number that of the High-Flyers; whatever advantage this last may have, from the quality of their leaders, the other is more powerful from the goodness of their cause, I mean the preservation of the King's just Privileges. This is properly the interest of all Englishmen, who cannot hope for greater happiness under any other form of Government, than under that which has been so long established. This branch of the moderate Tories becomes still more considerable as often as any attempt is made to extend or to abridge the Royal Prerogative. If to abridge it, they are joined by all the Whigs; if to extend it, they are assisted by all the rest of the Tories. Nevertheless it sometime happens, that the junctures produce some change in the principles, as well as in the interests of this party. When the sovereign favours the Tories in general, by conferring places and posts upon them, nothing is capable to detach the moderate Tories from his interest. But their affection cools whenever he inclines to the other side. Then, if they see the Whigs, by a precaution common to them, make any attempt upon the Prerogative Royal, they are ready to join them. But herein their sole aim is to let the King know that they deserve his regard. This course was frequently taken by them in the reign of King William, who often changed sides. In general, it is the interest of the moderate Tories to oppose the attempts of the Whigs against the authority of the sovereigns, because this supports their credit at court and in the country. But without they are to take care that the High-Flyers do not, under the specious pretence of being of the same name and party, carry them farther than is necessary.

As to the Church-Tories, it may easily be conceived that they include almost the whole Kingdom in their party, since this branch consists of all the members of the Church of England. Therefore when religion is in question, between the Whigs and Tories, the former are not able to resist their adversaries. To this subservience, owing the readiness with which the Church-Tories have been so long in submitting to the Pretence of Non-Resistance, I am now to return, who even in their greatest prosperity dare not much stir up the least thought of attacking the Church. They are so much attached to the Long Parliament, and it will never be for their interest, to look upon the Whig-party as an enemy, who would destroy the foundations of their Church, and from what was once done, infer the desire of doing the like again, when a favorable opportunity presents. This makes them so ready to receive every impression which from time to time is given them of the Church's being in Danger, and suffer themselves to be so easily seduced and misled. Their leader know so well how to improve the opportunity, that they project nothing in relation to the State, without consulting the Church. This is an inflexible expedient to which they are so much attached, which would be very much distressed were the Church itself so much concerned. This procured Charles I. many adherents, and really he would have wanted, had the Parliament not attracted the Church of England. Moreover it was this, which in the reign of Charles II. put the Duke of York, though a Popish Prince, at the head of the Episcopal Tories, who willingly concurred with him in the destruction of their enemies. Whenever King William turned to the side of the Whigs, the Tories were full of imaginary fears of his labouring the ruin of their Church. The same notion was pursued in the first years of Queen Anne, because the Church was then composed of Whigs or moderate Tories. The time when they threw the Episcopians, towards the conclusion of that reign, at the schemes of men who had visibly no religion at all, in testimony of this very pretence, we lately saw in the reign of George I. a Popish Pretender called in to screen the Church of England from the pretended attempts, she had to fear from the Whigs. It is this secret of intersting the Church in the quarrel was not practised by the High-Flyers would make a very contemptible difference, between the Whigs and moderate Tories would cause none of those disturbances in the Kingdom, which have so long prevail'd.

It is true that among the Church-Tories, there are some who are very sensible of the necessity, by which the whole party is engaged in a quarrel, advantageous but to few. Of this number are those, I call Low-Church-men, among whom some possess the first dignities of the Church. But they are not the strongest. The party of the rigid Churchmen is much more numerous. This last branch consists of almost all the inferior Clergy, of some Bishops, of both Universities, particularly that of Oxford, and these bodies draw after them great numbers of the Laity. It is these that compose what is called in England, High-Church, that is, a Church which has no mixture of Presbyterianism. These men are so attached to the least ceremony of the Church of England, that they would not relax upon any thing whatsoever, and by this stiffness, they discover more of the spirit of party, than of zeal for religion. I will even venture to say, that many of them would rather chuse to see England under Popery than Presbyterianism. Now, as the Low-Church men, though more moderate in their sentiments, look upon the High-Church as an essential point, it is not surprising that the Tories unite when the growth of Whiggism is to be opposed, which has all the Presbyterians in its party. It is, perhaps, an artifice of the State-Tories to have given, or at least to continue with so much care, the name of Tories to the Episcopalians, in order to confound in the same party, interests of a different nature, because this confusion is very detrimental to them.

The Papists are likewise considered as a branch of the Tories, because they always remain attached to that party. As they can never hope to see Popery established but by means of an absolute King, it is not strange that they rank themselves with the High-Flyers. Indeed, this assistance would not be very considerable to the Tories, if confined to the English Papists, since enjoying neither places, nor votes in election, they cannot have much credit. But the assistance of Papists, engages likewise foreign Powers in the Tory interest, who can on certain occasions be very serviceable. Nevertheless it cannot be denied, that by this, the Tories give their enemies great advantage against them, who use this pretence to render them odious.

If the leaders of the Tory party aimed only at maintaining the Prerogatives of the King, and the rights of the Church, it may be affirmed, that party would be invincible, because that is the true interest of the Kingdom. But as it sometimes happens, that these are only Pretences to cover other projects, less agreeable to the good of the State, when once their designs are discovered, their friends generally draw off, a division of the Tory-members being a necessary consequence of such discovery. This makes me think that it is almost impossible they should ever succeed in setting the Piemaker on the Throne, or investing any King whatsoever with absolute power. This opinion is founded upon its not being the interest or desire of the nation in general. And hence it is, that they so firmly espouse the interests of France, because they are very sensible they want her assistance. It was seen in the last war that the ill success of that deavoured, as much as possible, to lessen them, and to remove them they were at the Helm, their first care was to cure the wounds France had received. However, it is very difficult for France to put them them in possession of their wishes. Great-Britain is an Island which can hardly be attacked unawares; and which, while there is a good understanding between the King and the Parliament, can fend out fleets which France is not in condition to oppose.

The High-Fliers are therefore to be considered as a party, to which the junctures of the time are not at all favourable, and consequently it should be their interest to remain in a state of inaction, till time should produce some opportunity to exert themselves. But to be quiet is no part of their character. They can't possibly be easy, while they see themselves excluded from all places of honour and profit, which probably are the springs of their motions. It is however certain, that the disturbances raised by them from time to time to very little purpose, are attended with great injury to themselves, as well as to all the Tories in general, who are always charged with the faults and passions of those who are looked upon as their leaders. This very consideration induces some to desert their party.

As to the three other branches of the Tories, namely, the moderate, the rigid, and the low, it would be folly in the Whigs to think of their ruin by violent methods. This could not be effected without over-turning the Kingdom. They may indeed exclude them from public posts and employments. But should they be so imprudent as to meddle with the Church of England, they would run the hazard of raising a storm, which might cost them the superiority they at present enjoy. Therefore it is the interest of the Whigs to leave the Church unmolested, and their conduct shows they are perfectly convinced of this truth. Though they have lately had frequent provocations, it is not seen that now, they are in power, they seek to be reveng'd upon the Episcopal Party. On the contrary, their grand aim is to divide that party if possible, from the rest of the Tories, by convincing them that they bear no ill-will to the Church. If they could succeed, their victory over the High-Fliers would be certain. But these last, sensible of the prejudice, which this conduct does them, endeavour to prevent its effects by always engaging the Church in their quarrel, and inspiring the people with continual fears of the designs of the Whigs against the Church.

Having shown the views, strength, and interest of the Tory-party, I am next to speak of the four branches of the Whigs. As to the Republican-Whigs, they are at present very inconsiderable, and their party daily diminishes. There is not the least probability of their ever finding again an opportunity like that during the troubles of Charles I's reign.

I have already observ'd that the principal difference between the moderate Whigs and moderate Tories is, that the latter are more inclin'd to the King's Prerogative, and the former to the Privileges of the subject. But this prevents not their union when the State is in danger. Were the moderate Tories not Episcopalians, and had the moderate Whigs fewer Presbyterians among them, it might be hoped that these two branches of Whigs and Tories would remain for ever united, as they seem to be since the death of King William. But when I say that the one incline more to the King, and the others to the subject, I speak the truth, and not what they say themselves. The two parties affirm, on the contrary, they have no other aim, than the preservation of the Government as established many ages. So to hear them, you would think they form, and always have form'd one and the same party. It is however but too true, that their different inclination frequently obliges them to divide, though it is to be presumed, their intentions are equally good, and that they differ only in the means they employ. The one perhaps are too desirous of the increase of the royal Prerogative, and the others fear it not enough. But it is religion which chiefly makes them to be considered as different parties, because the one is compos'd wholly of Episcopalians, and the other has a great mixture of Presbyterians. Now to separate the interests of the Church from those of the State, requires abstractions of which all are not capable. Nevertheless it may be affirm'd, that the branch of the moderate Whigs consider'd separately, and in itself, is not less powerful than that of the moderate Tories. But when both join together, they form a party which would be irresistible, if religion were out of the question. The great business therefore of the moderate Whigs is to assist the People as much as possible, to discern the interests of the Church from those of the State; for which purpose they are to treat the Episcopalians with state; for which purpose they are to treat the Episcopalians with great moderation. Nor ought they to be less careful how they listen to the Republican-Whigs, for fear of alarming the moderate Tories, to whom they have frequent occasion. But on the other hand, nothing ought to be neglected by them for breaking the measures of the High-Fliers, who are their real enemies. Such is the course they must take to preserve their credit.

I proceed now to the Church-Whigs, who are divided into two branches, of which the first is of the rigid Presbyterians, who absolutely reject not only the Hierarchy, but moreover every ceremony practis'd in the Church of England. Their number is very great in England, but they are still more considerable by having all Scotland for them. They are continually labouring the propagation of Presbyterianism, and on some occasions the leading Whigs, to content them, are oblig'd to take some steps prejudicial to the whole party. It is easy to conceive that the interest of the rigid Presbyterians requires an innovation in the established religion, because it can only be by some great revolution that their own can come to be perpetual. Wherefore they are considered as dangerous men, and very unfit to head the Whig-party, who in all appearance, would be ill conducted by such leaders.

Lastly, There is an other branch of Church-Whigs, which includes the moderate Presbyterians, and to which may be added all the rest of the Non-conformists, as Quakers, Anabaptists, &c. who find more support from the Whigs than from the Tories, though their junction adds no great strength to the party. The moderate Presbyterians, less scrupulous, less passionate, and less obstinate than the rigid, make no difficulty to join the assemblies of the established Church, and even to communicate therein when their interest requires it. If it were left to their choice, Presbyterianism would be the reigning religion. But they do not think it prudent to labour to make it so by violent methods. They know, it would be an infallible means to unite all the Tories against them; whereas it is the interest of all the Whigs to keep them divided, by continually insinuating upon the distinction between State and Church-Tories, and showing that they have no ill design against the latter. These are doublets, the most dangerous enemies of the High-Fliers and rigid Tories, because by their moderate conduct they deprive them of the pretence to complain that the Church is in danger. These were aim'd at by the Tories in their act, towards the conclusion of Queen Anne's reign, against Occasional Conformity. As few are acquainted with the nature of this act, I shall briefly explain it.

In the reign of Charles II., an act was made called the Conformity Act, whereby any person admitted to any public office was to bring a Certificate of his having received the Sacrament in the Church of England. The intent of this Act was to exclude all Non-Conformists from places of any kind. Indeed, it produced this effect with regard to the rigid Presbyterians, who could not refuse to receive the Communion from the hands of a Bishop, or a Minister of the Episcopal Church. But the moderate Presbyterians were not so scrupulous. On their admission to any post, they scrupled not to receive the Communion in an Episcopal Church, and to take the proper Certificates. It was not possible for the Tories to add any Explication to this Act during the reign of King James, who on the contrary, granted an universal liberty of Conscience, not in the lifetime of King William, or the first years of Queen Anne. But having the power in their hands, at the conclusion of her reign, they were not contented with reviving this Act, but added to it a clause to prevent Occasional Conformity, or the communicating in the Church of England on account of some employment. This excluded not only the rigid but also the moderate Presbyterians from all public offices. For by this Act, which is still in force, to communicate once in an Episcopal Church, is not a sufficient qualification for a place, as before, but a man must show that he is really a member of the Church of England. If the Whigs who at present prevail, dar'd to meddle with this Act, it would soon be repealed. But for reasons before intimated, very probably it will be suffered to subsist, and its violation only conniv'd at.

The strength of the two parties being such as we have seen, and the interest of the several branches so opposite, it seems to me a natural consequence, that the placing a Popish Prince upon the Throne while the King and Parliament are in Union, and the rights of the Church are untouched, is a thing almost impossible. The people may from time to time be deluded by imaginary fears of the Church's danger. But this delusion must quickly vanish, when it is seen that the Church is not really attack'd. Now if religion is not concerned, that is, if the Episcopalians do not think themselves under an absolute necessity of trying all ways to save their Church from ruin, the endeavours in favour of the Pretender, will prove ineffectual. As often as it shall be attempted to place him on the Throne, the moderate State and Church-Tories will join the Whigs, and then, that party will be too strong for the High-Fliers, though in matter of religion, they should be joined by all the rigid Tories, which however is not very likely. For it must not be imagined, because a few rigid Tories make a great noise, that the whole branch wish to see a Popish Prince on the Throne. They are zealous for their Church, but their Church is Protestant, and this very zeal suffers them not to endanger their religion. It will be said perhaps that France will assist the High-Fliers with all her Forces. This is what I can hardly believe for reasons I shall mention hereafter. But though France should heartily engage in this undertaking, the execution would be difficult on account of the situation and naval power of England. Nothing but a surprize can produce the effect desired by the High-Fliers, Papists, and some rigid Tories. However, the attempt lately made, will probably induce the King and Parliament to take good precautions against such surprizes for the future.

There is still another everlasting obstacle to the establishment of a Popish Prince, and that is, the possession of some part of the lands of the Monasteries suppressed by Henry VIII. by almost every noted family in England. The ancestors of the present possessors either received them in presents from the King, or purchased them at an easy rate. If therefore a Popish Prince should now mount the Throne, there is no doubt but he would try to establish his religion. But should his attempt prove successful, in what danger would these estates be? In all probability the present owners would be dispossessed. Nay, who knows whether they would not be called to account for the profits? It is therefore manifest, that the Tories and Whigs have an equal interest in the prevention of this danger. If the advocates for a Popish Prince were to be strictly examined, it would be found, without doubt, either they have no possessions of this kind, or believe they have particular reasons to flatter themselves with an exemption from the general law, or with being made amends some other way.

I am now to give a more distinct idea of the two parties of Whigs and Tories, by showing their respective Characters.

The Tories in general are fierce and haughty. The Whigs are treated by them with the utmost contempt, and even with rigour when they have the superiority. As the Tory party is composed of Episcopalians, who properly make the Body of the nation, they look upon themselves as the prevailing party, and cannot bear an equality, much less a superiority, in their adversaries. I cannot better compare the behaviour of the Tories to the Whigs, than to that of the Roman Catholics to the Protestants in Countries where the Papists have the advantage of number, and the support of the Government. It is with regret that the Tories allow the Presbyterians Liberty of Conscience. When the Power is in their hands they seldom failed to prohibit their Assemblies, and to exclude them from public employments by Acts of Parliament. The last years of Queen Anne afforded flagrant instances of the Haughtiness of this Party.

There is still another Character which belongs to them. They are exceeding passionate and precipitate in their motions. This often disconcerts all their projects. When they have the reins in their hands they drive with amazing rapidity. Very remarkable proofs of this were seen under Charles II, James II, and the late Queen. Nevertheless it must be confessed that this rapidity is not always the effect of an impetuous passion, but is sometimes founded in policy. As the High-Flyers, who are commonly at the head of the party, sometimes project the alteration of the Government, they are obliged to embrace, with great haste, the opportunities which offer, because these opportunities are naturally transient. For instance, under Charles II, it was necessary to put a speedy stop to the progress of the Whigs, for fear the King, who was with some difficulty, and for other interests than his own, engag'd in the Plot, should alter his mind. Besides, there was no time to lose, because it was well known that the Whigs were labouring with all their power to inform the people of the true designs of the Court. So again, when James II, ascended the Throne, the presumptive Heir to the Crown was his eldest daughter the Princess of Orange, who was firmly attached to the Protestant Religion. Wherefore as the King might dye without Sons, all his projects would vanish by his death, if his work was not finished during his Life. It was necessary therefore to make haste, because the like opportunity would probably never offer again after his Death. For the same reason, Queen Anne being Childless when she put the Ministry into the hands of the High-Flyers, a peace was quickly to be concluded with France, and speedy measures taken for securing the Crown to the Pretender, lest her death should prevent the execution of their projects, as it really happen'd. It was undoubtedly on this account that a peace was so hastily concluded with Lewis XIV, because his assistance was thought necessary to accomplish the Work. Probably, if the Queen had lived a little longer, the Act of Succession had been repealed. But this precipitation which seems so necessary to the Tories, is, on the other hand, prejudicial to them, inasmuch as it too soon discovers the designs of their leaders, which require a gradual execution. In order to succeed, they must have a long and peaceable reign, a King favourable to their designs, and of great ability, or at least ready to be guided by their Counsels.

Another character of the Tories is, their change of principles as their party prevails or is humbled. When they have the Prince on their side, the doctrine of Passive Obedience is supported with all their power, and every ordinance of the King is to be obeyed without examination, because then, they would have the Whigs suffer themselves to be oppressed without any resistance. But when the Government is in the hands of the contrary party, this doctrine lies dormant or is forgotten. Thus, in all the Tory-Writers, who have transcribed the troubles of the reign of Charles I, Passive Obedience is established as a principle certain and incontestable. This is owing to their intention of representing the measures of the Parliament for their own defence, and in opposition to the designs of the Kings, as a horrible rebellion. When the Presbyterians were persecuted in Charles II's reign, Passive Obedience was every where talk'd of. But it was still much worse under James II. I remember to have heard from the Pulpit, the consequences of this doctrine carried as far, and perhaps farther than ever they were in France, under Lewis XIV. Great Strefs was laid upon a Canon of a Convocation of the Church of England, which imported, that arms taken up against the King by the subject, on any pretense whatsoever, is direct Rebellion: That whether the subject be upon the Offensive or Defensive, he is clearly condemned by St. Paul, who says, he shall receive to himself Damnation. But the Convocation in which this Canon was made, was held under Archbishop Laud, when Charles I, govern'd in an absolute manner, a little before the beginning of the troubles. But when King William was on the Throne, the doctrine of Passive Obedience was no longer enforced, because that King was considered as no friend to the Tories. The case was the same under Queen Anne, while the Ministry was composed of Whigs, and moderate Tories. But the Doctrine revived when that Princess delivered herself up to the conduct of the High-Flyers. But since King George has filled the Throne, the High-Flyers and rigid Tories plainly show, this Doctrine is only admitted by them when they have a Prince of their party, but is rejected without any scruple when the Government is not for them. For this purpose they have a distinction ready between a King de jure, and a King de facto, and maintain that only the King de jure has a title to this Obedience, but such is every King who favours them, whether he is upon the Throne, or has only pretensions to it.

Let us now speak of the Character of the Whigs. Those of this party who are rigid Presbyterians, are a stubborn and obstinate generation, who perhaps would be as hot and as passionate as the Tories were they in possession of power. But as, since the Long Parliament, the party has never been under their direction, it is not upon them that we are to form the general character of the Whigs, whereas that of the Tories is to be taken principally from the High-Flyers and rigid Tories, who are their leaders and directors.

The heads of the Whig-party, are much more moderate than the leaders of the Tories. Besides, they proceed generally upon fixed principles, from which they never swerve, except when they are obliged to give some satisfaction to the Presbyterians to keep them from desponding. Far from desiring, like the Tories, to carry things with a high hand, they advance gradually, without heat or violence. Their greatest trouble is to curb the passion of some among them, who, were they unrestrain'd, would quickly ruin the party. By this moderation, they try to insinuate mildly into the people, that they have no ill designs against the Church of England, in order to separate the Church-Tories from the High-Flyers. As it is the interest of the Tories to confound all the branches of their party, and unite them into one body, to be directed by the leaders; so it is the business of the Whigs to have these several branches distinguished, that the Episcopalians may be prevented from promoting the designs of the High-Flyers. But they would never be able to gain this point were they to use violence. Thus the gentleness and moderation of the Whigs is no less founded in policy, than the haughtiness and precipitation of the Tories.

The Whigs are charged with being greedy of riches and honours, and ungrateful to their adherents, which makes their friends often forsake them. I can say nothing to this, not being sufficiently informed of the particular concerns of the party. Besides, the examination of this charge would lead me to consider the conduct of those who think themselves ill used, which I would avoid, as contrary to my intent of confining myself to general Ideas. However, it may be said for the moderate Whigs, that generally they support a good cause, namely, the constitution of the government as established by law. They err indeed sometimes through too much care and distrust, which throws them now and then upon proceedings contrary to their true interest, and their own principles, since on certain occasions they maintain the privileges of the Nation and Parliament, at the expence of the royal authority.

As to the ecclesiastical Whigs, who are no other than the Presbyterians, all that can be said of them, is, that they are extremely prejudiced against Bishops, and the whole Hierarchy. Now the question is, whether this prejudice be well grounded, or being so, whether it affords just cause for separation. For my part, I look upon this dispute between the Episcopalians and Presbyterians as of little consequence. And therefore I cannot approve of the stiffness of the Presbyterians in a country where the reformation is established according to the Church of England, since the two Churches differ in no essential point. I say the same thing of the Episcopalians of Scotland, and perhaps in England itself, greater regard should be had to the scruples of the Presbyterians. But this is only my private opinion, which I do not pretend to give for a rule to the one or the other.

Before I proceed, it will be proper to obviate an objection which may naturally occur to the reader, namely, that every thing in England being done by way of Parliaments, these unions above-mentioned, whether of the branches of the same party, or of the branches of two different parties, seem to no purpose, unless made in the Parliament itself between the members. But so far are such unions from taking place in the Parliament, that one of the parties generally so prevails there, as to render the union of the rest of the members entirely fruitless.

To this I answer, first, that the Parliament consisting of two Houses, whereof that of the Lords remains always the same without any considerable change, these unions may take place in that House whose principles are not so variable as those of the Commons. Now as the Upper-House has power to throw out the Bills sent up by the Lower, it follows that the Lords, by means of such unions, may break the Commons measures. Consequently these unions may produce great effects.

Secondly, These unions may influence the elections of members. For instance, on suspicion that a Popish Prince is intended to be set on the Throne, the moderate Tories and Low-Church-men may join with Whigs, and cause such representatives to be chosen as are against what is feared, and thereby break the measures of the High-Flyers and rigid Tories.

Thirdly, Even in a House of Commons, consisting mostly of Tory members, the moderate among them seeing some design in hand prejudicial to the Nation, may join with the Whigs, and hinder the execution of it. The moderate Whigs might also unite with the Tories, if they saw the Republican-party growing too strong.

It must however be owned that Party-spirit, the cabals of the leading-men, the intrigues of the Court, the interest of particular persons, have but too much influence upon the Debates of Parliament. To say all in a word, the Parliament is composed of men who are not free from passions. If the Parliament were to answer the Idea which those conceive of it who are not thoroughly acquainted with its nature, it should be composed of perfect men. But as that is impossible, it would be proper, at least, to reform certain abuses, for which hitherto no remedy has been found, or perhaps sought. Tho' this leads me a little from my subject, I shall stay a moment and take the liberty to point out some of these abuses. This may at least serve to give a more extensive knowledge of the English constitution, which though excellent in its nature, is however liable to some imperfections.

The first abuse lies in the too great influence of the court in the elections of members, and consequently in the resolutions of the Parliament. This influence is visibly owing to the division between the Whigs and Tories which gives the King an advantage, he would doubtless not have, were all the people well united. When one of the parties gets into the Ministry, the Lieutenancies of the Counties and all the Court-places are conferred on persons devoted to them. After which, a new Parliament is called. Then, besides the money privately distributed by the Ministry, if report is to be credited, those that are in authority in the Towns and Counties, use all their interest and skill to get members chosen favorable to the Court, that the Ministry may have the superiority of votes in the House of Commons. We may judge of the effect of these intrigues by this single consideration, that commonly there is a Whig-Parliament when the Ministry is so, and a Tory-Parliament when the Ministers are Tories. Nevertheless the thing is not so very certain, but that we find sometimes most of the elections carried against the Court. But this rarely happens, unless the nation in general is satisfied that the Court has designs pernicious to the State, or the liberties of the subject. I say nothing of our seeing in the late reign twelve Peers created at once, with the sole view of procuring the Court a majority of votes in the House of Lords. This is a palpable as well as a very dangerous abuse.

Another abuse lies in many small Boroughs having a right to send representatives to Parliament whose votes have the same weight with those of the members of London and Westminster, notwithstanding the great disproportion between the electors of the one and the other. In these inconsiderable Boroughs, by the influence of the Court, members are chosen that have not a foot of land near the place. It is pretended by some, that these Boroughs have a right as ancient as the Parliament itself, having enjoyed it ever since the time of the Anglo-Saxons. Others think it of much later date. But however, it is at present a monstrous abuse, that Villages of four or five thatched Houses, should be upon the level in Parliament with the largest Cities of the Kingdom.

A third abuse there is of great importance, and which ought to be reformed, since it is in some measure contrary to Magna Charta, on which the English found their liberties and privileges. In this Charter, King John promises in express terms, for himself and successors, to declare beforehand the causes of calling a Parliament. As long as this custom was observed, the points debated in Parliament were not many, for which the members came prepared, and the Sessions lasted but a few days. If this was observed now, the Boroughs and Counties might give their representatives instructions upon the affairs for which the Parliament should be called, or at least, might chuse such members as are of the same sentiments with the electors. But at present, several abuses spring from the non-observance of this method.

In the first place, the Sessions hold as long as the King pleases, and are ended when he thinks proper. Henry IV. improved this advantage by keeping the Parliament assembled, till the desired Subsidy was granted. In the next place, the electors not knowing the business on which the Parliament is to proceed, are forced to give their representatives an unlimited power. Hence arises another abuse, that the representatives of a Borough or County are often of a contrary opinion to those that send them. It may therefore happen, nay it has frequently happen'd, that the resolves of the Lower-House are directly opposite to the sentiments of the people whom they represent. So it is not the People or Commons of England that share the Legislative Power with the King and Peers, but their representatives, who enjoy a Privilege which belongs only to the people in general, to whom however they are not accountable for their conduct. All they can suffer, in case they have acted contrary to the sense of their Borough or County, is not to be chosen another time. This seems therefore to be lodging too great a power in bare representatives. It was not so in France, when the States of that Kingdom were convened. Every province drew up, beforehand, their particular instructions (1), from which their deputies were not allowed to swerve. In like manner, in important affairs to be debated by the States General of the United Provinces, the deputies receive instructions from their Provinces; and in the particular States of each Province, the Magistrates of the Towns give their orders and instructions to their deputies.

A fourth abuse lies in the public canvasses at the time of elections, with great expense. It costs some men several thousands of pounds to be elected, and this openly in the face of all the World.

Lastly, There is another sort of abuse in the House of Commons, namely, that the members are allowed to go and come or absent themselves as they please, except on certain great occasions, so that of five hundred and thirteen members, (if I mistake not,) there are not present sometimes above one hundred and fifty. This makes it much more easy for the parties to cabal, than if the House were full. Moreover many members, though in London, do not constantly attend the House, but keep away upon any the slightest affair of their own. This puts me in mind of a pleasant story, with which I shall close this digression. A Whig-member telling one of the fame party in great anger, "That if he had been at the House that morning, they should have carried an important point." The other calmly asked him, "By how many they lost it? By one single vote," says he. The other replies, "Had I been there, we should have lost it by four, for there would have been four Tories more, whom I have kept all this morning on purpose at a Tavern."

It remains only that I briefly speak of the interests of the neighbouring States, with regard to the Whigs and Tories. Though the differences between the two parties seem only to respect England, they have a great influence on the affairs of the other States. The peace of Utrecht clearly shows of what consequence they are to all Europe.

Every one knows that the States-General of the United Provinces are friends of the Whigs, and very justly, since the Whigs have all along supported their interest in England. The Whigs obliged Charles II. to make a peace with Holland, when he was in league with Louis XIV. against her. From that time, they have ever considered the interest of the Dutch as their own. Accordingly in their turn they have received signal services from them, particularly in the assistance given by the States-General to the Prince of Orange, to go and break King James's measures. This good understanding is still cultivated, so that the Dutch may be said to be Whigs, and the Whigs to be Dutch. The reason of this union is evident. For France, perpetual enemy of Holland, ever supported the Tories; whence it follows, that Holland is obliged to stand by the Whigs, since she cannot expect assistance from England, but by their means. This is so clear, that it needs no farther illustration.

For the same reason, the Emperor, as Sovereign of the Netherlands, ought to be a friend to the Whigs. As he must look upon the King of France, as a very formidable and dangerous neighbour, he can expect the assistance of the English, in case his dominions are invaded, but when the Whigs are in power. In all appearance, the Tories would not exert themselves in the defence of the Netherlands against the invasions of France. But, as William III. was, through excessive zeal for his religion, lend his forces to the Pretender to ascend the throne of England, he would only render France still more powerful, and add to the balance of Europe a weight which would make it entirely incline to one side.

The interests of France with regard to the Whigs and Tories, afford matter for many more observations. In general, it is doubtless the interest of that Crown to cultivate a good understanding with England. Since the growth of the House of Austria, that is, since about two hundred years, England has ever had in her power to incline the balance either on the side of Austria or on the side of France as she pleased. But it has been her standing interest to keep the balance even between these two powers. This has been the hinge on which all the policy of the Kings of England has turned, for two centuries. Henry the Eighth's varying sometimes from this course is to be ascribed wholly to the private interests of Cardinal Wolsey his prime minister, or to his own caprice. So it was ever the interest of France to keep fair with England. Accordingly Louis XIV. has politically endeavoured these fifty years, either to get England on his side, or at least, to prevent her from espousing that of his enemies. But as it was not easy for that Monarch to persuade the English that to incline the balance to his side was for their advantage, he confined his endeavours to hinder them from concerning themselves in the affairs of Europe, to the end he might proceed without any opposition from them. But it must be observed, that this policy respected only his vast designs of enslaving all Europe. Otherwise, he would have had no need to trouble himself about the English. To set this matter in a clearer light, it will not be amiss to show briefly how this Monarch managed with regard to England.

Louis XIV., as every one knows, formed the project of an universal Monarchy in Europe. As he was not ignorant that England was concerned to keep the balance of Europe even, and that the English considered this maxim as the chief foundation of their security, he was justly apprehensive of their opposing the execution of his designs. For prevention of which, he used all his address to gain Charles II. to his interest, when he had resolved upon a war with Holland in 1672. The Ministry being Tory, he drew Charles, by their means, into a league with him. But this league was of no long continuance. It was so evidently against the interest of England, that the Parliament obliged the King to make peace with Holland. Nay, they would have constrained him to declare against France if the prospect of an approaching peace between that Crown and the States-General, had not hindered them from going so far.

The peace of Nimeguen, concluded in 1678, caused not the King of France to discontinue the prosecution of his grand designs. But as he was very sensible, King Charles would not have it in his power to follow his own inclination, he resolved to take another method, in order to disable England at least from interposing in the affairs of Europe. And that was to raise troubles in the Kingdom, and then to soment them, that the English might be employed at home. The Duke of York's Plots, the King his brother's catenels to be guided by his counsels, the choice of passionate and perhaps corrupt ministers, proceeded, in all appearance, from Louis's secret practices in England. This method succeeded to his wish. The Conspiracy discovered by Titus Oates, the pretended Protestant-Plot, the Persecution of the Presbyterians, the people's murmurs, the discord between the King and the Parliament, found the English to much employment at home, that it was not possible for them to look abroad. In the mean time, Lewis XIV. was rendering himself formidable to all Europe, having nothing to fear from the English who remain'd idle, when they should have used their utmost endeavours to put a stop to his progress.

Upon the accession of James II. to the throne, Lewis gave not over a method that had proved so successful. On the contrary, he pressed the new King of England to execute the projects he had formed when Duke of York, in favour of Popery and Arbitrary Power. He knew these two points were sufficient to keep England long employed; however, as his aim was only to embroil the nation, he never assisted King James to any purpose. The too sudden execution of that Prince's designs was not for his interest. When he saw him on the point of being attacked by the Prince of Orange, he never stirred in his defence, but rather made use of the juncture to carry war into Germany. He imagined that the troubles he had raised in England would long disable that Kingdom from opposing his ambitious designs. This was the sole end of all his proceedings. Afterwards, when King William proclaimed war against him, he sent King James into Ireland with seven thousand men, an aid too weak to restore him to his throne, but sufficient to make a diversion, and feed the hopes of the male-content. Thus is it demonstrable from Lewis's whole conduct, that his sole intention was to embroil England, and that King James was the dupe of his Policy. It seems however at first sight, that King James's restoration would have been for Lewis's advantage. But most assuredly it was against his interest for a King of England to be at peace in his dominions. The reason is plain; as it is the interest of England to keep the balance even in Europe, Lewis, who had formed vast projects, would have been in danger of being opposed by a King of England, who having no distractions at home, might in the end pursue his true interests, or be forced to it by his Parliament. And therefore, Lewis XIV. has been satisfied to keep England embroiled, and for that purpose, to hold secret correspondence with the leading Tories, who at length have discovered themselves in the last years of Queen Anne.

It seems therefore to be the French King's interest to preserve a good understanding with the Tories, in order, by their means, to foment the troubles in England. This is strictly true, when he forms designs against the rest of Europe. But if he aims to live in peace, and stand upon his defence, in case of invasion, nothing can be more for his advantage than to cultivate the King of England's friendship, according to the constant maxim of Lewis's predecessors, whether the ministry be Whig or Tory. France may now be said to be invincible, as long as England declares not against her. But if the King of England is provoked, and enters into a new alliance with Holland and Germany, the last war's experience shows that France is very far from being invincible. It may therefore be affirmed, that if the illustrious Prince (1) now at the helm of the French affairs, intends not to pursue the vast designs of Lewis XIV., it is not his interest to cherish the troubles of England, which, instead of being for his advantage, may greatly turn to his prejudice (2). I confess in the indirect assistance given the Pretender in France, the regent's proceedings seem to destroy the maxim I mean to advance. Time will unfold, perhaps, the mystery of this policy. But in the mean while, I cannot forbear thinking that he is misinformed of the true state of the two parties in England, and has given too much credit to interested and prejudiced persons. Perhaps, the Pretender himself has been deceived in the same manner.

I have but one observation more to make, with which I shall conclude what I have to say concerning the Whigs and the Tories. In speaking of their several views, interests and characters, I pretend not to include every particular person of either party, but only their leaders and managers, with some of the most active of both sides. Though the people in general, by inclination, or interest, are either Whigs or Tories, it does not follow that every single person acts in the views I have ascribed to them. It is certain most suffer themselves to be led without knowing where it is intended to conduct them, or examining the course prescribed them. Consequently they are far from being concerned in the intrigues and cabals of their leaders. Such a one has lifted himself a Tory, as being attached to the Church of England, and afterwards, without knowing how, finds himself obliged to maintain the principles of the High Flyers and rigid Tories, though contrary to his inclination. There are thousands of good Englishmen, without doubt, who grieve to see their country thus rent with divisions, and would gladly embrace all expedients to put a stop to them. But it is not easy to observe a just neutrality, because it is difficult to be without ambition and avarice. Those who stand neuter, as I said, are neither preferred nor trusted, by reason that one of the parties are always in power, and have nothing more at heart than the advancing their friends, or gaining some of their adversaries. Consequently there can be no posts or offices for men, from whom the prevailing party can expect no manner of service. Moreover, how can a man be neuter between two parties, each of whom represent their adversaries as designing those evils which are most apt to fill men with fears, I mean, the destruction of the religion they profess, and the dissolution of a Government, which alone, in their opinion, can render subjects happy? A man must be very infensible not to be moved with such dangers, when convinced of their reality.

All Englishmen therefore are not to bear the blame of these unnatural divisions, but only those who cherish them for their own private interest. Who are they that would invest the King with absolute power? Who are they that would deprive free-born subjects of Liberty of Conscience? Who are they, in a word, that labour to introduce Popery? Can it be said that these are the views of every particular Tory? No, by no means. But they are the aims of the leaders, who, for their own ends, seduce the poor people, and make no scruple to involve them in the danger of a civil war.

It may be affirmed, that it is not the Kingdom's interest for one of the parties to become so superior as to meet with no opposition. Should it be the High Flyers, they would introduce arbitrary power. And if it were the moderate Tories, their bias to the prerogative of the Crown, would at length enable the sovereign to shake off the galling yoke of Parliament. Were it possible for the Papists to be superior, England would soon lose her religion and liberty. On the other hand, if the Republican-Whigs should recover the advantage they have lost, you would hear no more of the Kingdom but the Commonwealth of England, as in Cromwell's days. Lastly, were the moderate Whigs to have the management, they would so guard against the encroachments of the regal power, that the sovereign would be reduced to the condition of a Doge of Venice.

As for the two parties with regard to religion, 'tis certain, if the Presbyterians can ever act without controule, they will not be satisfied till the Hierarchy of the Church of England be entirely demolished. But then, if the rigid Episcopalians have nothing to balance their power, the Presbyterians must expect to be openly persecuted. And who knows whether they will suffer them to enjoy a bare Liberty of Conscience?

Assuredly the welfare of the Kingdom consists not in any of the ends proposed by the leaders of both parties. The only way to restore peace and tranquillity, would be to leave the Government upon its ancient foot, and the Church, as established at the Reformation. It would also be necessary to grant a Toleration to the Presbyterians who are very numerous in the Kingdom. If this way be not used, it will always be better for the state that the people remain in division, than if one of the parties should acquire a superiority, which would be more fatal to the publick than the equality which cherishes discord. I do not see what can put an end to this sort of civil war, but the prudence of a just and equitable sovereign, moderate in his desires and passions, a lover of the Protestant Religion, and that makes the good and happiness of his subjects his sole care and study. This is what may with reason be expected from the King who now fills the throne, since he possesses all those virtues in an eminent degree. May Heaven prosper his designs, and may he live to see the happy effects of his pains and endeavours!

(2) It must be observed, that what Rapin says here of the interest of France, with regard to the Whigs and Tories was written before the conclusion of the alliance between that Crown, England and Holland, signed January 4, 1717. This Dissertation being finished in February 1716.

Extract of a Letter from Mr. Rapin to Monsieur Robethon, a considerable Person in the Service of his late Majesty King GEORGE I.

A Wezel le 20. de Septembre, 1719.

N^o 20. Sept 20 1719

— MON Histoire d'Angleterre est achevée. Je Pay conduite depuis le temps de l'invasion de Cæsar jusqu'à la fin du Règne du Roi Jacques I, et je suis presentement occupé à la revision. Je n'ay epargné, pendant quinze ans que j'y ay travaillé, ni peine ni soins pour la rendre aussi exacte qu'il m'a été possible. Il n'y a que le temps qui puisse m'apprendre, si j'aurai réussi. Ce n'est pas une petite entreprise pour un Galcon : mais m'y étant engagé sans en prévoir toutes les difficultés, je n'ay pu me résoudre à l'abandonner lorsque je les ay rencontrées. Le grand loisir dont j'ay joui depuis plusieurs années n'a pas peu contribué à me faire poursuivre l'exécution d'un si grand dessein. L'impression de l'Histoire de France du Pere Daniel Jesuite, a quey les Libraires d'Amsterdam sont occupez depuis quelques années, a fait que je n'ay pu jusqu'ici prendre des mesures pour l'impression de la mienne. Mais comme la premiere est sur sa fin, j'espere de conclure bientot pour l'impression de celle-ci.

Permettez moi, Monsieur, de vous demander deux avis sur ce sujet. Pay une extreme envie de dedier mon Histoire à sa Majesté Britannique, mais je ne sai si je puis prendre cette liberté sans sa permission, n'ayant pas l'honneur d'être connu de lui, en aucune maniere. Les Grands Princes sont tellement importunex par des dedicaces, qu'ils ne les regardent bien souvent que comme des leures pour leur attraper quelque Present, et je puis assurer avec la dernière sincerité que rien n'est plus éloigné de ma pensée, mon unique but étant de donner par là une petite marque de mon profond respect et de ma veneration pour sa personne. Je vous supplie de me donner quelque conseil là dessus.

Il y a encore une autre chose sur laquelle je prends la liberté de vous demander votre avis, lequel je suivrai exactement. Je suis persuadé que sa Majesté ne demandera pas d'un Historien, qu'il flatte ses predecesseurs qui ont occupé le même trone que lui, du moins, jusqu'à la fin du regne d'Elizabeth. Mais comme il tire son origine de Jacques I. et que c'est en vertu de cette descendance qu'il est aujourd'hui sur le trone d'Angleterre, et que pour dire la vérité, quelque ménagement que j'aye eu en écrivant le Regne du Roi Jacques I, je n'ay pu m'empêcher de faire connoître ses défauts, et particulièrement les voyes qu'il prenoit pour parvenir à une puissance absolue, & qui n'ont été que trop suivies depuis, je crains que sa Majesté ne trouvat mauvais qu'une Histoire qui lui seroit dédiée parut trop peu avantageuse au Roi Jacques. Je suis vous assurer pourtant, que je croi avoir évité tous les excès ou plusieurs Historiens sont tombez en parlant contre ce Prince, comme, d'un autre côté, je n'ay pu me résoudre à suivre ceux qui l'ont visiblement flaté. En general, comme je me suis fait une loi de dire la vérité, je vous avoue que je n'ay pu donner une idée fort avantageuse de ce Prince. Ainsi, je vous prie de m'instruire de l'honneur et du caractère du Roi à cet egard, et si vous jugez que je doive supprimer entierement le Regne de Jacques I, j'y souscrirai volontiers.

Vous savez aussi bien que moi, qu'on ne peut donner une connoissance bien distincte du Regne d'Elizabeth, sans entrer dans un grand detail des affaires de la Reine Marie d'Ecosse, et que c'est là le pivot sur lequel tournent tous les evenemens du Regne d'Elizabeth. Je me suis donc vu obligé de faire connoître Marie, et de faire voir en divers endroits, non seulement que Camden s'est trompé dans tout ce qu'il a dit de cette Reine, mais

— MY History of ENGLAND is finished. I have brought it down from the time of Cæsar's Invasion, to the End of the Reign of James I*, and am now employed in the Revival. During the fifteen Years I have been about it, I have spared no pains or endeavours to render it as accurate as possible. Whether I have succeeded, Time alone can discover. It is no inconsiderable undertaking for a Galcon : but being engaged in it without foreseeing all the difficulties, I could not resolve to relinquish it, when they occurred. The great leisure, I have enjoyed these many Years, has not a little contributed to the execution of so great a Design. The Impression of the History of France, by Father Daniel the Jesuit, which has employed the Amsterdam Booksellers about a Year, is the reason that I could not hitherto take any measures for the Edition of Mine. But as that is almost over, I hope soon to agree for the Impression of This.

Give me leave, Sir, to ask your advice upon two points. I am extremely desirous to dedicate my History to his Britannick Majesty, but don't know whether I may take that liberty without his permission, since I have not the honour of being any way known to him. Great Princes are so troubled with Dedications, that they generally consider them as Baits to draw some Present from them ; but I can affirm with the utmost Sincerity that nothing is farther from my thoughts, my sole aim being to give a small Token of my profound respect and veneration for his Person. I intreat your advice in this matter.

There is also another Thing, on which I take the freedom to desire your opinion, which I will punctually follow. I am persuaded, his Majesty will not require a Historian to flatter his Predecessors, at least till the End of Queen Elizabeth's Reign. But as he is descended from James I, and, by virtue of that descent, now sits on the Throne of England ; and as, to say the truth, whatever caution I have used in writing the Reign of King James I, I could not avoid discovering his Defects, and particularly the Methods practised by him to arrive at arbitrary Power, which have been but too much followed since, I fear his Majesty may take it ill that a History, dedicated to him, should appear so disadvantageous to King James. I can, however, assure you, I think I have avoided all the excesses into which several Historians have fallen in speaking against that Prince, as, on the other hand, I could not resolve to follow those who have visibly flattered him. In general, as I have made it a Law to speak the Truth, I own to you, I could not give a very advantageous Idea of that Prince. So, I beg the favour you would inform me of the King's Temper and Character in this respect, and if you think I should entirely suppress the Reign of James I, I shall readily consent to it.

You know, as well as I, that a very distinct knowledge of Elizabeth's Reign cannot be given, without a particular account of the affairs of Queen Mary of Scotland, that being the Hinge on which all the Events of Queen Elizabeth's Reign, do turn. I am therefore forced to make known Queen Mary, and show in several Places, not only that Camden is mistaken in all he says of that Queen, but also

* Rapin afterwards continued his History to the End of the Reign of King James II, and lived to see published, some Years after, in English, the History of England, and the two last Volumes, came out not long after his death.

Extract of a Letter from Mr. RAPIN, &c.

mais que même il a eu pour but de tromper ses Lecteurs, sur ce sujet. Les Explications dans lesquelles il m'a fallu entrer pour refuter Cambden et tous les Auteurs Papistes, ne sont pas à l'avantage de Maric. Le Roi le trouvera-t-il mauvais ? j'en avoue que je ne pourrois me résoudre à rien dire contre ce que je croi vrai. Mais d'un autre côté, j'aurois mieux sup- primer entièrement mon Histoire, que de rien avancer qui pût déplaire à un si grand Prince, pour lequel j'ai tout le respect et toute la veneration que tout le monde lui doit. Je vous supplie, Monsieur, de me donner vos bons avis sur ces Articles, lorsque vos affaires vous le permettent : car cela ne presse point du tout, n'y ayant encore rien de réglé pour l'impression de mon Histoire. Je suis avec toute l'estime et toute la considération possible,

Votre tres humble et

Tres obeissant serviteur,

THOYRAS RAPIN.

also intended to lead his Readers into Error. The Explanations I have been obliged to enter into, for the confutation of Camden and all the popish Writers, are not to Mary's advantage. Will the King be offended at this ? I cannot think of saying any thing contrary to what I believe true. But, on the other hand, I would rather entirely suppress my History, than advance what may displease so great a Prince, for whom I have all the Respect and Veneration, univerally due to him. I beg, Sir, you would give me your good advice upon these Points, when your affairs will permit it, for there is no haste, nothing being yet settled for the Impression of my History. I am, with all possible esteem and regard,

Your most humble and

Most obedient Servant,

THOYRAS RAPIN.

THIS History will be continued by the TRANSLATOR, in One Volume in FOLIO, from the REVOLUTION, to the End of the Reign of King GEORGE I. In this Continuation, RAPIN's Method, Faithfulness, Impartiality, Freedom, and Plainness, will, as far as possible, be imitated. At the Conclusion, will be added an exact Abridgment or Summary of the Three Volumes. As soon as the Reigns of King WILLIAM and Queen MARY are finished, this Work will begin to be published Weekly, and will be continued in that manner till the Whole is completed.

THE HEADS OF THE KINGS and QUEENS, &c.

The ANTIQUITIES that have been followed, and the PICTURES copied for engraving them described, with the ALLUSIONS and ORNAMENTS about them briefly explained.

SEVERAL Attempts have been made, (since the arts of printing and engraving were found out in Europe,) to collect and publish series of pictures of the Emperors of Rome and Germany, and of the Kings, Princes, and most illustrious persons of different nations; which have always been considered as agreeable and useful ornaments to their histories.

The Portraits of the Kings of England have not been unattempted at different times, but done so imperfectly, and from such spurious authorities, that they have rather given disgust, than satisfaction, to the Curious.

In order to the making this collection more complete, the utmost care has been taken and the most diligent enquiry made after the best authorities; first, for ancient coins, royal seals, statues, limnings, painted glass, paintings on wood, &c. now remaining: Those being the only authorities to be depended on with regard to the more distant of our English Kings.

In the later times, when the art of painting began to appear with greater elegance, the royal portraits here represented are taken from the paintings of the best masters; as is expressed under each picture, with the names of those noblemen and gentlemen in whose possession the originals are at present; whose favours, and the permission of access to the royal collection of pictures granted by his Grace the Duke of Grafton, Lord Chamberlain, is most gratefully acknowledged.

AN EXPLANATION of the ORNAMENTAL ALLUSIONS is added to this ACCOUNT of the HEADS, for the satisfaction of the encouragers of this work.

EGBERT.

Rapin I. p. 83. A Medalion, taken from a silver coin of this king, who united the Heptarchy or seven kingdoms into one, and thereby laid the foundation of the English monarchy; which is the reason of his being the first in this collection.

The arms of the seven kingdoms are represented on the top of the plate; and at the bottom, a Saxon leaning on his shield, pointing to the Map of England and the divisions of the Heptarchy; some Runic Characters, Stonehenge, Broken Idols, &c.

ALFRED the GREAT.

Rapin I. p. 90. From an ancient picture preserved in Univerfity College at Oxford. At the bottom is an ancient stone Bust of Alfred. A view of the Danish camp, where Alfred, disguised like a common minstrel is playing on the harp before his enemy's tents. This Prince defeated the Danes, took from them their standard of the Raven, restored the Muses to Oxford, appointed a fleet to guard the coasts, and established excellent Laws, alluded to in the ornaments of this plate.

CANUTE the DANE.

Rapin I. p. 124. A profile face, as represented on several of his silver coins, three of which are engraven at the bottom of this plate. This face is much like the coins in form and feature, as may be observed by comparing it with them, it is only enlarged and magnified to the dimensions necessary, retaining the general character of the face, head, and head-dress.

At bottom is represented this King sitting by the shore in his chair of state to command the waves, and rebuke his flattering courtiers, who deified him, and told him he was absolute Lord of the land and seas.

WILLIAM I.

Called the CONQUEROR. Upon this plate are represented his effigies from three silver coins; one with a p. 103. sword in his hand, the second with a canopy over his head, and the third with two Scepters; and also a little circle from an illumination in Domesday-book. From these remaining pieces of antiquity the idea of the effigies of this Prince is formed; great care and circumspection was used in selecting them from the fairest and best preserved coins in the cabinets of the curious.

The ornamental allusions at the bottom of this picture, represent England conquered and bound in chains, &c. the plan of Battle-abbey, founded by him, Domesday-book, ships, trophies, &c.

WILLIAM II.

Called RUFUS. Two different coins are assigned to Rapin I. this King by the collectors of our English coins, both p. 182. which are represented on the plate exactly of the same size. The King's picture is magnified from them, retaining the idea of the countenance as much as possible.

The accident of this King's death hunting in new-forest is represented in small. The mantle, shield, bows, and arrows are the ornaments of this head.

HENRY I.

Taken also from a silver coin; and partly from his effigies on his broad seal of wax, both well preserved to this p. 190. time.

This King, called BEAU-CLERK, was the first of his line that encouraged arts and learning in England. At the bottom is represented a cavern, wherein is supposed to be seen his elder brother ROBERT, blind and a prisoner, as he remained to his death.

STEPHEN.

The face is taken from the profile face on one of the two Rapin I. coins represented on the plate: And that of Matilda (commonly called Maud the Empress,) from a parchment roll, being a pedigree of the Kings of England, rudely drawn, according to the manner of that age, in the Herald's office.

On the scrole, shewn by the child or genius, is represented the descent and relation of STEPHEN and MAUD to WILLIAM the Conqueror, their ancestor. The thistles are thrown in, in allusion to the broils, which then began between England and Scotland.

The shadow at bottom shews the barbarous murder of this unfortunate Prince.

HENRY II.

Rapin I. The face is taken from his statue on his monument at p. 222. Font-Everaud in Anjou in France, where he was buried. This piece of antiquity being preserved, and representing this King in his royal robes, it was thought the best authority extant. The whole figure is printed in P. Montfaucon's antiquities, to whom the public is indebted for this draught.

Underneath is represented the death of Thomas a Becket Archbishop of Canterbury, who so long contested and opposed this King's authority in ecclesiastical affairs.

RICHARD I.

Rapin I. The effigies of this King is also taken from a statue of
p. 244. him, erected on his monument at the same place with his father's HENRY II. These statues are supposed to have been done soon after the interment of the Kings they represent, though removed into a more magnificent tomb in later times by the Lady Abbess of Font-Everaud, Jean Baptiste de Bourbon, daughter of HENRY IV. of France their relation, in order to preserve them to posterity.

The ornaments of this picture are disposed with his arms on his shield, his military weapons, and the lion's skin, to denote his heroic spirit, and in allusion to his name of COEUR DE LION.

JOHN.

Rapin I. This picture is drawn from the statue upon his monu-
p. 259. ment in the Cathedral of Worcester. It is another confirmation, that it was the practice then in England as well as abroad to preserve the likenesses of great persons after their deaths by these statuary images of them. And it is not a little surprizing to see in the broad seal of this King, how well they cut their pictures to represent his countenance in small, being very like and conformable to the face of this statue.

The figures at the bottom of this plate allude to the King's abject submissions, by advice of the Legate, to the Pope.

HENRY III.

Rapin I. This is taken from his monumental statue in brass in
p. 296. Westminster-abbey; and was erected there with great cost and care to his memory, who built great part of that stupendous pile, of which a view in small is represented at the bottom of this plate, with a draught of that curious wrought monument or shrine, erected by him for the relics of EDWARD the Confessor.

EDWARD I.

Rapin I. The draught from the remains of his statue over the
p. 357. gate of Caernarvon castle, which he magnificently built, and what is to be seen on his great seal and his silver coins are all we have to form our idea of the countenance and person of this great and heroic King.

Over his head to illustrate his qualities is represented the morning-star as the emblem of his early and super-eminent glory, with the lawrels and trumpets of fame blended together. The plate is ornamented with a view of himself, sitting on his throne as Umpire between Baliol and Bruce, competitors for the crown of Scotland; a sketch of his statue over Caernarvon gate is meant to be represented on one side, and on the other one of the crosses erected by him in memory of his beloved Queen Eleanor.

EDWARD II.

Rapin I. In the Cathedral Church of Gloucester is his statue upon p. 383. his monument now entire and well preserved, from which this picture of him is taken; and very probably these monumental effigies are of the best authority remaining, as they shew the exact form of the features and dress of the times, when Paintings were not customary.

EDWARD III.

This great and magnanimous Prince as the art of scul- Rapin I.
ture improved considerably in his long and victorious reign, p. 406 was at many times variously represented in pictures, as appears by the paintings at Windsor, and in other places. Those paintings, his monumental statue of brass, formerly gilt with gold on his tomb in Westminster-abbey, his broad seals, and small limnings in vellum manuscripts, all convey the same idea of his countenance.

The Sun in his meridian altitude is on the top of this plate as the emblem of this Prince's virtues and glory. The conquest of France, the institution of the most noble order of the garter, the glory of his arms, and nobility, and the downfall of the French power are the trophies of his picture. The Basilio relievo at bottom is intended to represent the procession of the Kings, Princes and Nobles taken in the field of battle.

EDWARD Prince of WALES.

The statue of that most noble and heroic Prince in Rapin I. brass gilt with gold is preserved on his monument in the p. 438. Cathedral Church of Canterbury; from which, and his almost defaced figure in a window at the west end of Westminster-abbey, this is drawn.

The glory of this most illustrious prince, the delight and ornament of this nation and mankind, is exprest on the small tabature on his right hand; where he is represented bringing conquered Kings and Princes to his father's throne.

RICHARD II.

From that ancient and valuable picture in Westminster-Rapin I. abbey, painted on board, sitting in his royal robes; proba-
p. 453. bly of as great antiquity as any painted picture of that magnitude now in being.

The white hart couchant under a tree is the emblem used by this King, and also the broom-cod open. He joined the Arms of England and France with those of EDWARD the Confessor. On the Roll is represented this King's resignation of his crown to HENRY of Bolinbroke, in the presence of the Nobility and Bishops in Parliament.

JOHN of GAUNT, Duke of LANCASTER.

From a painted glass in an ancient window in the Li-Rapin I. brary of All-Souls College in Oxford. As there are several
p. 436. other persons of that time represented there in the same manner, and this College and Library were founded by Archbishop Chicheley, it is very probable he was personally known to them, and saw the paintings done from the best authorities.

He took the red rose for his cognizance, and from him the other Kings of that branch used the same device. The eye of providence and the Bible are introduced by way of allusion to his promoting Wickliffe's doctrine, and the Reformation. His monument is partly represented at bottom, as it was erected in St. Paul's Church London, but destroyed by the great conflagration in 1666.

HENRY IV.

Son of JOHN of Gaunt. This plate shews not only Rapin I. the portrait of this prince, but also the head-dress worn in
p. 484. those times; used by him rather before he was King than afterwards, as appears by his ancient picture on board, in the palace of Kentington, and another like it at Hampton-Court in Herefordshire, (which had been his Palace.) All the Knights of the garter of the first institution have the same head-dress.

His device was the fox's tail and the lion's-skin joined together, conceived to mean strength and courage united with art and policy, when lineal right was wanting to support the red rose.

HENRY

The Cat, the Rat, and Lovel the Dog, Rule all England under a Hog.

HENRY V.

Rapin I. The picture of this most glorious prince is preserved on board, painted antiently, now amongst the royal collection in the palace of Kensington, and in vellum-manuscripts of that time. His face moulded in plaister, used at his pompous funeral according to authors of good credit, is still extant: from these this plate is taken.

The English Lion supporting the arms of England and France, the beacons on fire, his mottos Une sans plus and Dieu et mon Droit signifying his vigilance and sole sovereignty over the two Kingdoms. The representation of his marriage with Catherine de Valois, only daughter and heiress of France, as a sculpture in Basso relievo is added, with the Flower de luces, to adorn this plate.

JOHN Duke of BEDFORD, Regent of FRANCE,
Brother of HENRY V.

Rapin I. From a curious Limning, finely done in a manuscript prayer-book presented by himself to HENRY VI, now in the possession of the Right Honourable the Earl of Oxford. In one of the leaves of this book the Regent is represented kneeling, and his Dutcheſs in another, both magnificently dressed, with allusive mottos, A vous entiere &c. suitable to each person. Also their coats of arms and supporters as on the print, with the flock of a tree, alluding to Woodstock, the place of his birth.

HENRY VI.

Rapin I. From an ancient painting on board, done in the stiff flat manner of painting, now in the royal Collection at Kensington palace.

The character of this prince is alluded to at the bottom of the plate, by a view of himself kneeling in a chapel and adoring a crucifix.

EDWARD IV.

Rapin I. His picture painted on board is preserved in the royal collection, and represents him fair, and not fat and fleshy, as he afterwards grew, and as he is represented; in a large piece, said to be his picture, in the Palace of St. James's.

The arched Crown first used by this King on his great seal; the white rose radiated which his ancestor Edmond Langley Duke of York, son of EDWARD III. took for his cognizance and the fetter-lock with the Motto, Hic Hæc Hæc Tacetis, he applied to himself and family, are expressed amongst the ornaments on the plate; as is the magnificent interview between this King and the King of France upon a treaty of peace on a bridge over the river Soame.

EDWARD V.

Rapin I. From the only picture perhaps ever done of this Prince, which is a painting in a manuscript book, wherein the King his father is represented sitting, the Queen his mother standing, with this Prince by them, and Woodville Earl of Rivers the Queen's brother, presenting a book to the King. This manuscript is in the Archbishop's palace at Lambeth.

The emblem of a rapacious Harpy on the top, and the dead Lambs, or innocence murdered, at the bottom of this plate, are ornaments adapted to his History.

RICHARD III.

Rapin I. From an original painting on board now in the royal palace at Kensington. This with some of the before mentioned pictures was removed from the ancient palaces at Westminster and Whitehall, when they were destroyed by fire.

The fancy at top, in imitation of painting upon glass, alludes to a Story in this Kings reign, of Mr. Collingborn a Gentleman, who was executed for a Rhime, (said to be wrote by him)

This King's Device being a white boar and HENRY VII's a dragon; at bottom is represented a dragon overcoming a boar. The red dragon was the Ensign of Cadwallader, the last King of Britain, said to be the ancestor of HENRY VII.

HENRY VII.

His picture is taken from originals in the royal collection. Rapin I. on in Limning and in oil-colours, and also from a draught P. 649. of that famous large piece of painting, formerly on the wall in the privy-chamber at Whitehall, done by Hans Holben, representing this King and his Queen as big as the life, This most noble and valuable Family-piece was burnt with that palace 1697.

The Union of the houses of York and Lancaster, (the red and white Rose) is alluded to by the two Cupids at bottom embracing each other, and pointing to the picture of Queen Elizabeth of the house of York.

HENRY VIII.

From an original painting in Kensington palace. Many Rapin I. and various pictures of this King are done in large and p. 702. small Limnings by his famous painter, Hans Holben; besides several others by painters of less note.

The well known Facts of this King's reign, the remarkable Divorce of his first Queen, and their separation are alluded to by the representation, at the bottom of this engraving. The reformation of religion, and the abolition of the papal power in these kingdoms, plentifully supply decorations for this plate.

EDWARD VI.

From an original in Kensington palace, painted by Rapin II. Hans Holben. P. 3.

The noble foundations of this excellent young Prince, Christ's Hospital, St. Thomas's in Southwark, St. Bartholomew's, and St. Bride's Hospitals for the education of youth, the cure of the diseased, and the employment of idle persons and vagrants, are immortal instances of his piety, charity, and benevolence; the emblems of which were thought the best ornaments for his portrait.

MARY.

From a picture in possession of the Right Honourable the Rapin II. Earl of Oxford, originally painted by Sir Anthony More p. 27. Knight.

By the Decorations about her Picture are implied her Character, her inclination to Popery, her setting the triple Crown above her own, and making the Crofs and pastoral Staff her support; which the esteemed above worldly honours. Her zealous and Religious cruelties cannot be represented in so small a compass.

PHILIP II.

King of Spain, Husband to Queen Mary, from an ex-Rapin II. cellent original painted by Titian, now in the noble collection of his Grace, William Duke of Devonshire. P. 36.

About this head are represented only the several Coats of arms of the dominions and territories under his government when married to Queen Mary.

Queen ELIZABETH.

From her picture curiously drawn by Isaac Oliver, in Rapin II. the collection of Dr. Mead. P. 50.

The starry firmament and the Phoenix in flames, represent the immortality of her exalted virtues. Her fame extending to the utmost bounds of the earth: her justice and piety in defense of the Gospel, her esteem for the holy Bible, Bible, and her regard for all Protestants, are intended to be signified by the ornaments of this plate.

HENRY Lord DARNLEY.

Rapin II. Husband of Mary Queen of Scots, and Father of JAMES I. of England. This picture is in the royal palace of St. James's, and also another at Hampton Court, painted 1563; by which date it appears to have been drawn immediately before he went to Scotland.

His crown is clouded over to represent the violence and diversity of his fortune. The robes at bottom express his being made Knight of the noble order of St. Michael by the King of France. The combustible matter thrown in is designed to express the manner of his violent death.

MARY Queen of Scots.

Rapin II. From an original painting in the royal collection in p. 132. St. James's, Annus 1580.

From the date and melancholy air of her picture it is conceived much of her juvenile bloom must have been wasted when this was drawn. The darts of death, and the crown encircled with thorns, are allusions to her unhappy Fate.

JAMES I.

Rapin II. From an original painting in the palace of Hampton- p. 158. Court, by Paulus Vanfomer.

The Union of the two Kingdoms under him, and the History of his reign and the reigns of his Successors is so well known, that it may be thought unnecessary to annex any explanatory notes concerning the few ornaments and decorations added to them.

HENRY Prince of WALES,

Rapin II. Eldest Son of JAMES I. from a curious Limning by p. 181. Isaac Oliver, in the possession of R. Mead, M. D.

Princess ELIZABETH.

Queen of Bohemia, Daughter of JAMES I. from Rapin II. an original in the royal apartments of St. James's by p. 186. G. Honthorst.

CHARLES I.

From an excellent original painted by Sir Anthony Van-Rapin II. dyke, preserved amongst the royal collection in Hampton- p. 237- court.

OLIVER CROMWELL.

Lord Protector. His picture from a most valuable original limning by Samuel Cooper, in the possession of the p. 591. honourable Sir Thomas Frankland, Baronet.

CHARLES II.

From a picture in Bridewell-hall, the original painted Rapin II. by Sir Peter Lely. p. 618.

HENRY Duke of GLOUCESTER.

Brother of King CHARLES II. He died soon after Rapin II. the Restoration, and was buried in Westminster-abbey. p. 611.

This original was painted from the life, at the particular request of Secretary Pepys, by Sir Godfrey Kneller. p. 741. 1688.

A Brief Historical Account of the MONUMENTS of the KINGS of ENGLAND, &c. with their EPITAPHS translated.

Rapin I.
p. 137.

EDWARD the CONFESSOR.
THIS Monument or rather Shrine erected by HENRY III. is in the venerable chapel, that takes its name from this King and Saint. It is composed of stone, covered with mosaick-work of stained glass of various colours, particularly red and gold. The stone-work is hollow within side, where there is a large chest bound with iron, into which it is said, the old coffin being decayed with the bones of this King in it, were put by order of King JAMES II. Over the stone-work is a neat and regular wainfoot frame, said to have been formerly plated with gold, and adorned with precious stones. Those precious stones are supposed to be no more than the same kind of mosaick-work of stained glass, which still remains on the pilasters, and several parts of the Monument. That frame had another over it, which is now much decayed and sunk in; and over these on the top of the Shrine was the curious one mentioned by Matthew Paris. The tomb seems to have been repaired in RICHARD III.'s time, as is conjectured from the painted Mosaick of gold and black to be seen in some places of it. Round the Verge is this inscription in gold letters upon black.

Omnibus insignis virtutum laudibus heros
Sanctus Edwardus Confessor, Rex venerandus Quinto die Jani moriens super æthera scandit.

*Motto. SURSUM CORDA. Moritur anno Domini 1065.

In English,

The Hero renowned for all Virtues,
Saint Edward the Confessor, and venerable King, Dying the 5th of January, he ascended to the skies.
PLACE YOUR HEARTS ON HIGH.

He died in the year of our Lord 1065.

The above Inscription is supposed to have been put on this tomb, when the old one embossed on it was worn away: these monkish verses were the old one:

Anno milleno Domini cum septuageno,
Et bis centeno, cum completo quatuor dexto,
Hoc opus est factum, quod Petrus duxit in actum, Romanus civis; homo, causam noscere si vis,
Rex fuit Henricus, Sancti præsentis amicus.

The sense of which is,

In the year of our Lord 1280, this work was finished by Peter, a Roman citizen: Reader, if you will know why it was done; it was because King HENRY was the present Saint's friend.

WILLIAM the CONQUEROR.

Rapin I.
p. 181.

The first Monument of this prince was a very stately Mausoleum, erected by WILLIAM RUFUS his second Son in the front of the high altar of the abbey of St. Stephen, a Benedictine Convent founded by him at Caen in Normandy. One Orho a Goldsmith had the direction of this work, the materials of which were gold, silver, and curious stones. The Wits of that age composed epitaphs for it; but that of Thomas Archbishop of York had the preference, and was inscribed upon the tomb. See the plate. There is an old translation of it as follows:

He that the sturdy Normans rul'd,
And over English reigned,
And stoutly won, and strongly kept
What he had so obtained;
And did the swords of those of Mans
By force bring under awe,
And made them under his command
Live subject to his law;
This great King WILLIAM lieth here
Entombed in this grave,
So great a Lord, so small an house
Sufficeth him to have.
When Phæbus in the Virgin's cap
His circled course applied,
And twenty three degrees had past,
Even at that time he died.

This stately Monument subsisted till the year 1562, when the city of Caen being taken by Count Chastillon, some of his Soldiers opened it. Not finding the treasure they expected, they broke it to pieces, and threw out the Conqueror's bones, of which some were afterwards brought to England.

The Monks of that abbey caused the tomb, represented in the plate, to be erected in the year 1642; the sides and ends of which are of speckled Marble, and the top of Lapis Lydius or Touchstone: the whole structure is raised on a Case of Free-stone. On an Escutcheon at the head are the three Lions of England, and at the foot upon another, the two Lions of Normandy. On the fourth side the ancient Epitaph by Thomas Archbishop of York is restored, and on the north is the prose-inscription as on the plate; In English thus:

This Sepulchre of the most victorious and merciful Conqueror, WILLIAM, whilst he lived, King of England, Prince of Normandy and Mans, the most pious founder of this abbey, being broke to pieces and thrown down by the frantic rage of the Hereticks in the year 1562, was at length rebuilt by the noble religious of this abbey, out of their pious sense of gratitude to the memory of so munificent a Benefactor, in the year of our Lord 1642. John de Bailhache being Principal of the Monastery.

P. D. D. D.

WILLIAM RUFUS.

HENRY I. his brother and successor ordered a Monument to be erected for him facing the high altar in the church of St. Swithin at Winchester. This tomb is of grey marble, raised about two foot from the pavement. It was broke open by the rebels in the reign of King CHARLES I. and it is said the king's ashes, some fragments of cloth of gold, a large gold ring, and a small chalice of silver were found in it.

The two lines in a scrole on the top of this plate are translated in Mat. Pridcaux's Introduction to History thus,

The King the flag, vengeance the King, doth chase;
Tyrel's hard hap concludes this tragick case.

HENRY II. and RICHARD I.

The Monument of these princes was erected in the church of the monastery of Font-evaerd by the Lady P. 243. abbess, Jean Baptiste de Bourbon daughter of HENRY IV. of France, in honour of them, and others of the Norman line buried there. Their effigies were removed from their first station in this church to this new Mausoleum, with those of their Queens, Eleanor of Aquitain, and Berengaria of Navarre. RICHARD's lay first at the feet of his father HENRY's, and was gilt with gold. HENRY has a Latin epitaph on his tomb, which with King RICHARD's is upon the plate. It is to this effect in English:

If conquer'd realms or pow'r from death could save,
I HENRY, mighty King had 'scap'd the grave;
To me, who thought the earth's extent too small,
Now eight poor feet, a narrow space, is all.
Reader behold in mine, thy own sure fate,
And curb thy vast desires, and know thy state:
He, whom the globe entire could not suffice,
In this small tomb in smaller ashes lies.

To the Statue of RICHARD was affixed six verses, which express his greatest exploits; as his victory over the Sicilians, his conquering Cyprus, his sinking the great Galleys of the Saracens, the taking their convoy, and the defending Joppa in the Holy-land against them. Those verses are upon the plate; but as they are not very practicable in English Rhimes, the substance of them was thought sufficient here.

K. JOHN.

His tomb is in the Cathedral Church of Worcester. It is of grey marble, and stands in the center between the great altar and the choir. The figure of the king as big as the life, with the effigies of the two famous bishops, St. Oswald and St. Wulfstan in little, between whom he lies, are carved on one stone, which seems to be as ancient as HENRY III.'s time. But the altar-tomb, on which it is laid, is of a more modern fabrick. This Monument has no Inscription.

HENRY III.

Upon the north side of EDWARD the Confessor's Monument in Westminster-abbey, King EDWARD, this prince's p. 347. son, erected a magnificent monument for him, It is Mosaick faulk work of grey marble, chequered with Gaspar and Opals, and other curious stones; in the midst of which are large oblong faces of Porphyry, and Serpentine stone, which he brought from France, when he returned from the Holy-land. Upon the superficies lies the figure of the King in his royal robes with his crown on his head, and his feet placed upon two lions; the whole of copper gilt, and carved lozenge; every lozenge containing a lion passant gardant. His globe and scepter, which were formerly in his hands, have been stolen. About the verge of this tomb is a French Inscription in Saxon capitals as on the plate: In English:

Here lies HENRY, sometime King of England, Lord of Ireland, Duke of Aquitain, son of King JOHN also King of England; on whom may God have mercy, Amen.

On the north side of the same Monument in gilt Saxon Capitals are the Latin words, as at the bottom of the plate; their sense is,

HENRY the third (the re) builder of this Church: With this Motto, War is grateful to the unexperienced.

Near the Tomb also formerly hung a Tablet on a Pillar with the three latin lines in old English characters on the plate, and the English of them in these words:

The friend of piety and alms-deeds,
HENRY the third whilome of England King,
Who this church brake, and after his meed,
Again renewed into this fair building:
Now resteth here, which did so great a thing.
He yield his meed, that Lord of Deities,
That as one God reigns in persons three.

EDWARD I.

Rapin I. His Monument is in Westminster-abbey, on the north-
P. 387. side of EDWARD the Confessor's Chapel, at the head of his father HENRY III's tomb. It is composed of five grey marble stones, two for the sides, two for the ends, and a fifth covers it, (a very plain Monument for so great and glorious a prince.) Upon the north-side of it are the latin words on the plate. In English:

EDWARD the first the scourge of the Scots is here. Observe Treaties.

And on a Tablet was formerly the epitaph in Latin and English, as at the bottom of the plate.

Rapin I. His son EDWARD III. erected a Monument for him in P. 405. the monastery of St. Peter, now the Cathedral of Gloucester. The materials of it are white stone; his effigies is of alabaster. It stands in the second arch on the north-side of the altar, betwixt two Tuscan pillars. About these pillars near the capitals are the figures of several flags, by which he was said to be drawn thither from Berkely Castle. There is no inscription on this tomb.

EDWARD III.

Rapin I. On the south-side of EDWARD the Confessor's chapel,
P. 445. between two pillars, and parallel with the tomb of that king, EDWARD III. has a monument of grey marble, upon which lies his portraiture of copper gilt. On the verge of this Tomb are the barbarous monkish verses engraved at the bottom of the plate. Near to it was a Tablet with that epitaph englished in no unequal strain:

Of English kings here lies the beautiful flower
Of all before passed, and a mirror to them shall sue:
A merciful king, of peace conservator,
The III EDWARD, the death of whom may rue
All English men, for he by knighthood due,
Was Libarde invict, and by feat Martiall
To worthy Maccabe in vertue peregall.

On the sides of this monument are the figures of all this prince's sons and daughters in solid brass. On the south represented by the plate, in several niches are EDWARD Prince of Wales, JOAN DE LA TOWER, entituled Queen of Spain, LIONEL Duke of Clarence, EDMOND Duke of York, MARY Dutches of Bretagne, and WILLIAM of Hatfield; under whom their several coats of arms are enamelled, and beneath those escutcheons are four large shields of the arms of St. George and King EDWARD.

On the verge between these large shields, and the figures of the princes are the latin words on the plate, signifying,

EDWARD the third known by his fame above the skies,
Fight for your country. 1377.

On the north-side were the statues, and still continue the arms of ISABEL Lady of Coucy, WILLIAM of Windsor, JOHN Duke of Lancaster, BLANCH DE LA TOWER, MARGARET Countess of Pembroke, and THOMAS Duke of Gloucester. Near this Tomb stands the sword, which this king is said to have used in the conquest of France. It is seven foot long, and weighs eighteen pounds.

EDWARD THE BLACK PRINCE.

His Monument is in the Cathedral of Canterbury, on Rapin I. the fourth side near the chapel of Thomas a Becket. It is P. 439 a stately fabrick of grey marble, upon which lies his effigies of copper gilt. The end and sides of this tomb are adorned with escutcheons of copper, enamelled with his arms and devices, and overwritten with the words, HOU-MONT, and ICH DIEN. On an iron bar over the tomb are placed the helmet, crest, coat of mail, gauntlets, and on an adjacent pillar the shield of arms richly adorned with gold, which he is said to have used in battle. Upon a fillet of brass is circumscribed the epitaph in old French as on the plate; of which Weaver in his monuments gives this translation.

Here lieth the noble Prince Monsieur EDWARD, the eldest son of the most noble King EDWARD the Third, in former time Prince of Aquitain and of Wales, Duke of Cornwall and Earl of Chester, who died on the feast of Trinity, which was the eighth day of June in the year of Grace 1376. To the soul of whom God grant mercy, Amen.

Who so thou be that passeth by Where these Corps interred lie, Understand what I shall say,
As at this time speak I may,
Such as thou art, sometime was I,
Such as I am, such shalt thou be.

I little thought on hour of death,
So long as I enjoyed breath;
Great riches here I did possess,
Whereof I made great nobleness;
I had gold, silver, wardrobes, and Great treasures, horses, houses, land;
But now a caitife poor am I,
Deep in the ground, so here I lie:
My beauty great is all quite gone;
My flesh is waisted to the bone.

My house is narrow now, and throng,
Nothing but truth comes from my tongue,
And if ye should see me this day,
I do not think but ye would say,
That I had never been a man,
So much altered now I am.

For God sake pray to the heavenly King,
That he my soul to Heaven would bring:
All they that pray and make accord
For me unto my God and Lord,
God place them in his paradise,
Wherein no wretched caitife lies.

RICHARD II.

HENRY V. removed the body of this prince from Rapin I. Langley in Hertfordshire, where it had been privately interred, into a magnificent monument, prepared for it by his order, and his first Queen ANNE in Westminster-abbey. It is on the fourth side of the royal chapel of EDWARD the Confessor, at the head of EDWARD III's tomb. The materials are grey marble, upon which lie the effigies of RICHARD and his Queen ANNE of gilt copper. The Latin epitaph at the bottom of the plate, describing the lineaments of his body and qualities of his mind, is upon the verge of the tomb, beginning on the north side at the feet. The sense of it seems rather to proceed from the same motive, that induced HENRY V. to shew such regard to his remains, than from any real attributes of that weak and unfortunate prince. There was formerly a tablet near the tomb, on which it was thus englished:

Perfect and prudent,
RICHARD by right the second,
Vanquished by fortune,
Lies here now graven on stone:
True of his word,
And thereto well refund;
Seemly in person,
And like to Homer, as one
In wordly prudence,
And ever the church in one Upheld and favoured,
And calling the proud to ground,
And all that would
His royal state confound.

On

On the base is a Latin verse and motto, in English;

RICHARD the second destroyed by a cruel death. To have been happy and most miserable.

HENRY IV.

Rapin I. His tomb is in the Cathedral at Canterbury of Alabafter P. 503. partly gilt, and seems to have been erected by his second wife Queen JOAN of Navarre, whose effigies lies upon the right hand of his. It is situated between two pillars on the north side of the chapel of St. Thomas a Becket, opposite to the monument of EDWARD the Black Prince. At the head of the tomb stands an angel supporting a long escutcheon of the arms of France and England, impaling quarterly Evereux and Navarre. On the inside of the canopy are three other escutcheons; in the first are the arms of France and England quarterly, in the second the arms of France and England quarterly impaling Evereux and Navarre, in the third Evereux and Navarre quarterly. The canopy is diapered with eagles volant and chained, subscribed with the motto, A TEMPERANCE. The Cornish is garnished with the arms of several of the nobility of that age, underwritten on the border with the word SOVERAYNE. It does not appear that this tomb had any inscription.

HENRY V.

Rapin I. He is interred in the abbey of Westminster at the feet of P. 531. EDWARD the Confessor in a small chapel, much improved, and beautified with several statues by HENRY VII. See the plate of this chapel.

In the inside upon his tomb erected by CATHERINE of Valois his widow lay his statue of silver gilt. The head of that image in the reign of HENRY VIII. with the plates of silver covering his trunk made of oak, and his regalia, were stolen away. His effigies, as in the print of his monument, was taken from an original painting formerly in the royal palace at Whitehall. The epitaph, which was defaced at the time his tomb was robbed, was only two wretched monkish verses, as on the plate, in English;

*Duke of the Normans, their true conqueror,
Died heir of the Franks, and also their bestor.*

EDWARD IV.

Rapin I. His monument is in the new chapel of Windsor, founded P. 628. by himself. It is composed of steel polished and gilt, representing a pair of gates between two towers of curious workmanship after the Gothick manner. This tomb is fronted with touchstone, and stands in the north arch near the high altar. The epitaph in monkish Latin verses annexed to the plate, as it is not inscribed on the tomb, and has nothing in it besides some low-strained encomiums, which argue the barbarous taste of the age in which it was wrote, we shall leave as we found without a translation. It was registered in a book in the college of arms.

EDWARD V. and RICHARD Duke of YORK.

Rapin I. The bones of these two princes by the order of P. 636. CHARLES II, in whose time they were found, were put into a marble urn, and deposited among the monuments of the royal family in the chapel of HENRY VII, with a Latin monumental inscription upon it. In English thus,

Here lie the remains of EDWARD V. King of England, and of RICHARD Duke of York. These unhappy brothers, who were shut up in the Tower, and there smothered with pillows, by order of their perfidious uncle RICHARD, the usurper of the throne, were privately and indecently buried. Their much desired bones, diligently and often fought for in vain, July 17, 1674, one hundred and ninety one years after their death, were dug up in the ruins of a stair-case, that formerly led to the chapel of the white tower, and known by most undoubted tokens. The most compassionate King CHARLES II, pitying their severe fate, thought fit to order those most unfortunate princes this place amongst the monuments of their forefathers, in the year of our Lord 1678, and the thirtieth of his reign.

HENRY VII.

Rapin I. His monument is a most magnificent Mausoleum, erect- P. 691. ed in the fine chapel, which he added to Westminster-abbey. It was made by Peter a Florentine for one thousand pounds sterling, and is all of wrought copper, which the artist obliged himself to find. It is allowed to be one of the finest pieces of workmanship in the world; as Lord Bacon confirms in his history of this prince's reign, where he says, That he hath buried at Westminster, in one of the stateliest and daintiest monuments of Europe, both for the chapel and for the sepulchre; so that he dwelleth more richly dead in the monument of his tomb, than he did alive in Richmond or any of his palaces.

On the fourth side of this tomb, towards the top and near the king's effigies, is the inscription on the top of the plate. In English:

Here lies HENRY the seventh of that name, King of England, son of EDMUND Earl of Richmond, who being created King, August 22, was crowned the 30th of October following, in the year of our Lord 1485. He died April 21, in the fifty third year of his age, and reigned twenty three years and eight months wanting one day.

On the north side of this monument on the left hand of this prince's effigies, lies that of ELIZABETH his Queen, under which in a square Tablature is this epitaph.

Hic jacet Regina ELIZABETHA, EDWARDI quinti quondam Regis filia, EDWARDI quinti Regis quondam nominati soror, HENRICI septimi olim Regis conjux, atque HENRICI octavi Regis mater inclita. Obiit autem suum diem in turrim Londoniarum, Die 11. Feb. 2. Anno Domini 1502. 38 Annorum etate functa.

In English:

Here lies Queen ELIZABETH, daughter of King EDWARD IV, sister of King EDWARD V, wife of King HENRY VII, and renowned mother of King HENRY VIII. She died Feb. 11, 1502. in the tower of London, having completed her thirty eighth year.

On the freeze of this monument beginning on the fourth side at the head, are the latin verses at the bottom of the plate of the tomb. In English:

Here lies HENRY the seventh, the glory of the kings of his times, for wisdom, riches, and the fame of his great actions. To which nature had bounteously added her choicest gifts; elevation of aspect, majesty of feature, and dignity of form. He was joined in marriage to a consort equally affectionate, beautiful, chaste and fruitful. Happy parents in their offspring; to whom, England, you owe an HENRY VIII.

And about the Sacellum both within and without, are embossed the verses in old English characters, which are at the bottom of the plate representing the Sacellum. Septimus Henricus &c. In English:

In this tomb rests HENRY VII, who was the glory of kings, and the light of the world. A vigilant and wise prince, a lover of wholesome virtue, egregious for beauty, strength, and resolution. Who restored the kingdom's peace, terminated many wars, and always returned victorious from his enemies. Who married his two daughters to two, and was in alliance with all, kings. Who founded this holy chapel, and erected this sepulchre for himself, his consort, issue, and family. He lived fifty three years, and reigned near twenty four. He died April 21, 1509. England, no former ages have given thee so great a king, future will scarce give thee his equal.

EDWARD VI.

He was buried under the fine altar at the head of HEN- Rapin II. ry VII's Mausoleum. It was destroyed in the civil wars, P. 26. This exceeding curious piece of work seems to have been executed by the same artist that performed the other admirable brass works in this chapel. The epitaph at the bottom of the plate was wrote by Jerome Cardan, and with some liberty is rendered, in English:

Let the whole world their common loss deplore,
For EDWARD dies, and glory is no more.
He was the good man's hope, youth's brightest flower.
Joy of the age, and pride of sovereign power:
For him Apollo and Minerva moan,
Their blooming hope untimely dead and gone.
Whilst these last gifts the weeping nine bestow,
Melpomene laments in strains of woe,
And hails thee fleeting to the shades below.

Queen ELIZABETH.

JAMES I. her successor erected a magnificent monument Rapin II. to her memory in the east end of the north isle of her P. 157. grandfather HENRY VII's chapel. It is an arch of white marble supported by ten Corinthian pillars of black marble, under which lies her effigies in royal robes. The freeze is adorned with the arms of all the royal marriages from EDWARD the Confessor, and with impalements of several branches of the royal family.

On a Tablature over the cornish at the head of the tomb is this inscription, which Speed in his Chronicle translates thus,

For an eternal Memorial

Unto Elizabeth, Queen of England, France, and Ireland, daughter of King HENRY the eighth, grandchild to King HENRY the seventh, and great grandchild to King EDWARD the fourth. The mother of her country: The patroness and nurse of religion and learning; a princess for all the endowments of body and mind, and more especially for her royal virtues above her Sex,

INCOMPARABLE,

JAMES King of Great-Britain, France, and Ireland, heir both of her throne and virtues, hath piously erected this monument to a princess so worthy of commemoration.

On the basement at the top are these words,

The Sisters MARY and ELIZABETH, who possessed the same throne, are companions in the grave, and here sleep in hopes of a resurrection.

On a like Tablature on the cornish at the feet is this Inscription.

Religion to its primitive purity restored; peace established; money reduced to its just value; domestic rebellion quelled; France relieved when involved in intestine divisions; the Netherlands supported; the Spanish Armado overthrown; Ireland almost lost by rebellion, retrieved by defeating the Spaniards; the revenue of both universities much enlarged by a law of provisions; AND LASTLY, ALL ENGLAND ENRICHED:

ELIZABETH,

During forty five years a most wise governour, a victorious and triumphant Queen, most strictly religious, most happy, by a calm and resigned death at her seventy second year, left her mortal remains, till by Christ's word they shall rise again to immortality, to be deposited in this famous church by her repaired and reestablished.

On the basement at the feet are these words,

She died the twenty fourth of March in the year of Salvation 1602, in the forty fifth year of her Reign and the seventy second of her Age.

MARY Queen of SCOTS.

Rapin II. King JAMES her son, not long after his coming to the crown of England, erected a magnificent tomb for her in the fourth aisle of HENRY VII's chapel, over a vault to which her body had been removed from the Cathedral of Peterborough, where it had been first interred. It is raised in the form of a triumphal arch, supported by eight Corinthian pillars, under which lies her portraiture in royal robes. The freeze is adorned with the arms of several marriages of the kings of Scotland, and the top crowned with her achievements. On several tablaturs of marble round the tomb are epitaphs, which give a brief account of her royal descent, and relations, the exquisite Endowments of her body and mind, the troubles of her life, her constancy in religion, and resolution in death. The inscriptions on the plate are in English:

The first part of her Epitaph is upon the South side of her Tomb in Roman Capitals.

D. O. M.

Sacred to the Memory of MARY STUART, Queen of Scotland, and Dowager of France, Daughter and sole Heiress of JAMES V. King of Scotland, and Granddaughter of MARGARET, eldest Daughter of HENRY VII. by ELIZABETH eldest Daughter of EDWARD IV. (Kings of England) Wife of FRANCIS II. King of France, whilst she lived, certain and undoubted Heiress to the Crown of England, and Mother of the most potent JAMES, Monarch of Great Britain. She was descended from a truly royal and most ancient Line, nearly allied by Descent and Consanguinity to all the greatest Princes of Europe, and was abundantly adorned with the most excellent Endowments of Body and Mind: But as all human Affairs have their Vicissitudes, after a Confinement of about twenty Years, and having struggled with Resolution and Fortitude, (tho' ineffectually) with the malignity of Calumniators, the jealousy of the Fearful, and the snares of capital Enemies, she was at length, an unprecedented, unheard-of Example with Kings, brought to the Block; where, with contempt of this World, triumphant in Death, and fearless of the Executioner, recommending her Soul to Christ her Saviour, her hopes of Empire and Posterity to her Son JAMES, and the example of her Patience to all the Spectators of so bloody and mournful a Scene, she piously, patiently, and intrepidly submitted her royal Neck to the accursed Ax, and exchanged this transitory Life for a blessed Eternity in Heaven, on the eighth of Feb. In the Year of our Lord, 1587. Aged forty six.

The other part of the Epitaph is on the North side of the Monument in Hexameter and Pentameter, or Elegiack, Verses. In English:

If Birth illustrious, or if Beauty's pride,
A guiltless Mind and Faith severely try'd,
If Wisdom, Fortitude, a candid breast,
And Hope in Him who comforts the distress,
If Probity of Heart, with Patience mild
To bear injurious bonds, to be revild;
If Goodness, Majesty, a lib'ral Will
To raise the wretched, and the Poor to fill,
Could 'scape blind fortune's thunders, that alike
On good and bad, on low and lofty, strike;
Thou hadst not early fall'n by being Great,
Nor thy sad Image seem'd to weep thy fate.
Scotland by right, by marriage France was thine,
To these well-founded hope did England join,
By triple-right a triple-crown she wears,
But dim it's lustre to a crown of Stars,
Happy, too happy if, the storm allay'd,
Tho' late the neighb'ring realm had her obey'd,
But see! she falls to triumph in the grave;
New vigour thence, and fruits, her branches have.
Conquer'd she conquers, free tho' close confin'd,
Not dead tho' slain; the fates her chains unbind.
So the prun'd Vine shoots forth with fertile sprays,
And the cut gem reflects it's purple rays:
So genial seeds committed to the earth
Rise from the fruitful soil, a brighter birth.
With blood, God's covenant with man was made,
With blood, the Patriarchs his wrath allay'd,
With blood, the First-born 'scap'd the general doom;
Blood stain'd the land which now is He's become.
Oh stay thy vengeance Heav'n for mercy's sake;
That fatal day be ever mark'd with black,
To murder Kings abhorr'd for evermore,
Nor Britain stain'd again with royal Gore:
Let the example perish with the blow,
Accurs'd its author, and its actor too.
Since in her better part she triumphs still,
Dumb be her fate, and silent ev'ry ill.
Such was her course as heav'n thought fit to steer,
She had her joys, she knew her sorrows, here,
Early to life the Royal JAMES she gave,
Whom ev'ry kinder pow'r in keeping have.
By nuptials great, by birth still greater known,
And greatest in her issue, such a Son;
Here MARY lies, of whom we singing sing,
The Daughter, Wife, and Mother of a King,
Grant Heav'n, that to the latest times her race,
Their happy hours without a cloud may pass,
H. N. lamenting.

Over the Cornish of this Tomb at the Head is part of the 21st verse of the 2d Chapter of 1 Peter.

Christus pro nobis
Passus est, relinquens
Exemplum, ut sequamini Vestigia ejus.

In English:

Christ also suffered for us, leaving us an example, that ye should follow his steps.

Over the Cornish at the feet is the 23d verse of the same Chapter.

Qui cum malediceretur
Non maledicebat, cum Pateretur, non Cominabatur; tradebat
Autem judicanti justè.

In English:

Who when he was reviled, reviled not again; when he suffered he threatened not; but committed himself to him that judgeth righteously.

JAMES II.

This Monument was erected in the Chapel of the Rapin II. Scotch College at Paris in the Year, 1703. The principal parts of it are an Obelisk, in the Front of which is an Urn crowned with an Imperial Crown, and supported by two Angels. Under it upon the Base are the Royal Arms of England with Trophies on each side. Near the top is that Prince's Head in Basso Relievo within a circular Vase, adorned with Palms and crowned with an Imperial Crown. The Materials are white and veined Marble.
